

MACMILLAN AND CO., LIMITED LONDON - BOMBAY - CALCUTTA MELBOURNIE

THE MACMILIAN COMPANY
NEW YORK + EPCTOR + CHICAGO
ATLANTA + SAN FRANCISCO

THE MACMILLAN CO. OF CANADA, Lad.

ASHLEY

AND OTHER STORIES

MRS. HENRY

AUTHOR OF "EAST LYNNE," "THE CHANNINGS," "JOHNNY LUDLOW," ETC.

EIGHTY-FOURTH THOUSAND

MACMILLAN AND CO., LIMITED ST. MARTIN'S STREET, LONDON

1908

All rights reserved

1655

PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWER AND COME, EPIGLISH, STREET, STAMFORD STREET, S.E., AND CREAT WISCOMET STREET, W.

PREFACE.

THE following stories are now published in a collected form for the first time. To the reader, therefore, they will be virtually as new matter.

' It will be observed that in the first three stories some of the characters are reproduced, though, in one instance, merely a name -that of Chase. Mrs. Henry Wood intended, had she lived, to weave these stories into one romance. How this would have been accomplished by the experienced hand of the author of "East Lynne" we do not doubt. Fresh plot and new characters would have been introduced into the narrative, so connecting one story with But the pen was laid uside before the purpose was carried out; and it only remains for the reader to imagine for himself a chain of circumstances by which these now separate threads would have been gathered into a consecutive and complete whole. We have stated the fact because it undoubtedly adds to the interest of the following pages, which are amongst the most graphic and vigorous of the stories written by Mrs. Henry Wood.

One more remark may be made. It may be said by some that the leading incident, the three-fold tragedy, in the story of "Mr. Castonel," is far-fetched and improbable. But truth, we know, is stranger than fletion, and these incidents in the career of the surgeon are founded upon absolute facts.

CONTENTS.

ASILLEY.

CHAPTER			PAGE
Ĭ.	LAURETTA CARNAGES		1
31.	High Theason	••	9
111.	"Ryle the Second"	• • •	26
1V.	OED HANNAU		110
v.	THE BUTTERFLY CHARE		15
VI.	St. Ouest		59
	" Milade with be rise to him?"		61
	6 Abduley for even !"		78
	Major Hayne's Perfective		86
	THE DELAYED WILL		05
	Bianoidi		104
XII.	"I do not understand"		100
	THE MAJOR'S STORY
XIV.	CHEATING DOES NOT ALWAYS PROSCER	•••	124
	THE ENGAGEMENT OF SUSAN OF	(ASE	4
1,	LIEUTERANT CARNAGE	••	. 132
El.	THE TWENTY-SINTH OF MAY		147
	A. Consultation
	The Pines
	Mil. Leicester		180
VII.	THE END OF AN ILL-STAUMED VISIT		. 200
VIII	Home at Lass	•••	21
1X.	Phances Maitland's Angen		22

ASHLEY.

CHAPTER I.

LAURETTA CARNAGUE.

THE red light of the sun, nearing its setting, shone brilliantly on the fair domains of Ashley. The house, a fine mansion, stood on an eminence in its park, and commanded an extensive view of the near and distant scenery. Several of the windows opened to the lawn, and there leisurely stepped out of one of them a gentleman of middle age, followed by a young lady in the bloom of youth. He, Sir Henry Ashley, held a telescope in his hand, and, setting it to the right focus, turned it in the direction of the high road, which they could see winding along beneath them into the distance.

"Anna!" called out a peremptory voice from within the room, "you have not put on your sun-bounet."

"I have my parasol, mamma."

Oome in and put on your sun-honnet instantly. Your face will be a fright to be seen. The sun this month browns worse than at midsummer."

Lady Pope's mandates were not to be disobeyed, and Aum Rivers retreated to the house.

"Look here, Anna," said Sir Henry Ashley, when she reappeared; "yours is a farther sight than mine. Is that the carriage, near Prout's farm? There's something moving."

Miss Rivers looked towards the spot indicated by Sir Honry: first by aid of the glass, then steadily with her naked eye. "I think it is a post-chaise," was her answer.

"Then there has been some bungle at the station, and she has missed my carriage,"

"There always is a bungle when things are left to servants," interposed Lady Pope's voice again. should have gone yourself, as I advised, Sir Harry."

"So I would, had I been sure of her coming. went yesterday, and I went the day before, and nothing came of it. I can't pass my days dancing between here and Stopton. She's staying, no doubt, at that old Indian's at Liverpool. They who were to receive her and start her off hero."

"I wish she was not coming at all," cried Lady Pope. "The idea of a gay man-as you may be called being left resident guardian to a girl of twenty ! Steps must be taken to provide her with another home-and a neverending trouble I foresee we shall have about it. You might have taken my advice and declined to receive her here at ill. Under the circumstances you would have been justified, without any breach of politeness."

"It would have been more a breach of kindness," said Sir Harry, dryly. "As you happen to be with me, this house is as suitable for her, at present, as any other. But I cannot make out how it was the General never received the news of my wife's death."

"Very likely you forgot to write," observed Lady Pope, "Carelessness was always the besetting sin of Hemy Ashley."

A conscious smile curled Sir Henry's lip. Carelessness is besetting sin! then what might be said of many others hat beset him? He made his sister no reply. She was iven by nature to fits of grumbling, and Sir Harry had mg ago found that the best plan was to let her grumble he fit out. He took up a newspaper, stretched himself on me of the benches, and read away at ease. Lady Pope aised her voice now and then, but Sir Harry took refuge n the journal, as an excuse for silence. Presently Anna livers, who had walked to the brow of the slope, came back gain.

"The chaise is coming on quickly, Sir Harry. It is a shaise, and has taken the Ashley turning."

"Then she has missed the carriage!" protested Lady Pope. "Those two men will be sticking themselves with t at Stopton until the last train's in to-night; and that will se eleven o'clock. Getting tipsy, of course. Bud managenent, Sir Harry."

An interval of expectation, and the chaise spoken of rattled over the gravel drive of the lawn. A tall, disinguished-looking young man sprang from it before it had well stopped. Lady Pope wheeled her chair to the glass loor, and put her head out, hoping to bring the arrival within view; her cars also at work, as they generally were.

"That's not Miss Carnagie! Why, I do believe it is—Anna," she sharply called out, breaking off her sentence, "Anna, come here. That's never Arthur Ashley?"

- "Yes, mamma."
- "What brings him here now? Herem"
- "How are you, dear Lady Pope?" cried the stranger coming up with Sir Harry, and holding out his hand.
- "None the better for seeing you, Mr. Ashley," was the civil rejoinder. "Pray how is it that you come wasting your time here now, shirking your studies?"
  - "I went up for honours, door aunt, and gained them. Se

I can afford myself a holiday." At which satisfactory information, Lady Pope vouchsafed nothing but an unsatisfactory grunt.

The two gentlemen were speedily immersed in college politics, reminiscences to Sir Henry, realities to Arthur Ashley. Sir Henry had never gained university honours, had never tried for them, but he was delighted that Arthur, his presumptive heir, should do so. Sir Henry had been always childless, and this young man, his brother's eldest son, was the present heir to Ashley. Sir Henry had taken to him years ago, and brought him up as such.

A short period, and another arrival aroused them. They went out to meet it, Sir Harry hurriedly, Arthur Ashley and Miss Rivers lingeringly, for he seized the opportunity of speaking to her in a whisper. Sir Henry's carriage was drawn up before the entrance. A hady, dark as a gipsy, with flashing eyes and features of great heauty, sat in it, whilst a copper-coloured woman was awkwardly descending from the seat behind. Sir Harry soon had Miss Carnagie on his arm, and led her in.

She seemed to take in everything with those keen, thathing eyes; the extensive grounds, the indoor arrangements of the house; and now she was addressing Lady Pope. It bruck some of them that she was more self-possessed in namer than is common to a girl of twenty.

"I hope I have the pleasure of meeting Lady Ashley in ood health."

"This is my sister, Lady Pope," interrupted Sir Harry.
"I wrote to General Carnagie of the loss I had experienced in my wife: the letter must have misearried. Lady Pope and Miss Rivers will welcome you, dear Miss Carnagie, as warmly as Lady Ashley would have done."

"I am an invalid," broke in Lady Pope; "a chronic affection of the hip joint and cannot walk without difficulty."

LATIRETTA CARNACIE.

So I am chiefly confined, in the day, to this chair. Anna Rivers will be my substitute in showing you to your rooms.

At the foot of the stairs, when Anna Rivers was conducting Miss Carnagic towards them, they came upon young Ashley. "As no one has thought me worthy of an introduction to Miss Carnagic, I suppose I must introduct myself," he said. "Miss Carnagic, I am Arthur Ashley."

It is voice was so pleasant, his manner so easy, himsel altogether so much of a gentleman, that it would have beer sufficient passport to her favour, even without his goo looks, and Miss Carnagie thought so. But she hurried of if ever there was a vain girl on earth, it was Laurett Carnagie, and she had no wish to linger with stranger until the dust and the travelling attire were taken off her She had a favourite theory—that first impressions were everything. Some trunks were in her room, and the copper maid was scated on them; her head wrapped round wit folds of pink merino, and her shoulders with a covering a white linen.

"You good-for-nothing, vicious creature!" broke of Miss Carnagic. "How dare you sit idling there, instead of putting out my things to dress?"

"How can Nama get out missic's things if missic get the keys?" responded the woman, her broad mouth breaking into a pleasant smile.

"She is the most idle thing alive," said Miss Carnagie Anna, as she threw a ring of keys to the attendant. "India servants always are. If I were not to rate her continual I should get nothing done. Papa was often obliged have her florged."

"Flogged 1" uttered Anna, who had stood by, qui distressed at witnessing such discourtesy to a servant.

"And as you don't allow flogging in England, and sknows it, she has made up her mind to be as vicious a troublesome as possible," proceeded Miss Carnagie. " My mother was the daughter of a West Indian planter, and Nana was a slave born on the estate, so she is our own property, just the same as our horses or dogs. They had her taught hair-dressing and millinery, that she might be a maid to me; and when mamma died, she specially bequeathed her to me."

"But Nana not idle, Nana not vicious; Nana love missie, and try, try, try alwars to please her with all her heart." interrupted the woman, whilst tears ran down her cheeks.

"Can I assist you in any way?" inquired Anna Rivers of Miss Carnagie. "If not, I will no longer intrude upon you." "You don't intrude. I hate to be alone. whilst she does my hair. I want to know all about everything here. You are aware I am a stranger. Do you live here?"

"No. "I am visiting here with manuna, Lady Pope,"

"Was that really Sir Harry Ashley? I pictured bim as old as my father; and he had white whiskers and a bald head. Your uncle is a young man. At least, we should call him so in India : men age so rapidly there."

"Sir Harry is more than forty; near fifty, I believe, But he is not my uncle."

"No! He introduced Lady Pope as his sister."

"But Lady Popo is not my mother. In point of fact, she is not related to me. My father, Captain Rivers, was a widower, and she-who was Miss Ashley then married him. I was only two years old, and have never known any other mother. My father did not live long, and then also married an olderly man, Colonel Sir Ralph Pope." "Is he here?"

"Oh! he is dead too: has been dead a long while,"

"Who was that we met in the hall? 'Arthur Ashley,' he said. Some one also attached to the house ?"

"Sir Harry's nephow. He lives here. He is the heir to Ashley. His father, Sir Harry's brother, was the heir, but he is recently dead."

. " He will be Sir Arthur Ashley?"

"Of course. In time."

"Which dress missic wear?" inquired Nana, displaying two or three, all of them much alike: black silk with crape trimmings.

Miss Carnagic pointed to one, "It is so annoying to be in mourning!" she pettishly exclaimed. "One can never appear to advantage."

"I like black silk," remarked Anna. "It always looks well."

"For you, who are fair; but I look like a great black crow in it." And Anna Rivers laughed.

Not like a black crow, but like a handsome girl. Sir Harry thought so when she descended to the drawing-room, and so did Arthur Ashley. The latter was extremely fond of handsome girls, and ready to flirt with all he had the good fortune to meet.

It was no doubt very wrong of Lady Pope, but she was given to building castles in the air. She might have raised as many for herself as she pleased, but an inconvenience sometimes arose when she so favoured her friends. Several years older than her brother, she had exercised an influence over himself and his actions in early life, which she strove still to retain. She it was who had helped him to his wife, and now she had it in her head to help him to another—and that other Anna Rivers. Anna was so completely under her finger and thumb, that she felt sure if she could only see her my Lady Ashley, she should be the real ruler of her brother's house. A suspicion had certainly arisen in her mind that Anna cared rather too much for Arthur Ashley, but it gave her little concern. She held the young lady in perfect subjection, and she entered on a course of snubbing towards the gentleman, which she hoped would not fail to drive him away from Ashley. Cold, cautious, and positive, Lady Pope rurely failed to carry out any scheme on which she had set her mind.

- "If you were to amuse yourself with a little music this morning?"
  - "I never play when there's no one to play for."
  - "We have plenty of books. Anna, reach-
  - "Don't trouble yourself. I don't care for reading."
- "What do you care for, I wonder?" thought Lady Pope. "I fear, Miss Carnagie, this wet morning is rendering you very dull."
  - "Dreadfully so. I wish I had lain in bed."
- "Lying late in bed is permisions to the health. Even I, with my lame leg, am out of bed every morning at seven. How did you contrive to amuse yourself in India?"
- "Oh, I like an Indian life!" was the animated reply; "no one there reproaches you with being idle. I rode, and dressed, and firted, and lay to be fauned, and
- "Flirted!" interrupted Lady Pope. "Surely I did not hear aright?"
- "What's the harm of flirting ?"
- "A young lady reared in European society would shrink from such an avowal."
- "Why, it is what everybody does," returned Missisanagie. "Those who say they don't when they do are proceed, that's all. Old ones are more addicted to it than young. I saw you flirting the other evening, when that man dined here, Lord—what's his name? the new member."

Lady Pope turned green; she had never been so insulted in her life. "Miss Carnagie!" she uttered, in an awful tone. "Your remark upon myself I pass over with the contempt it deserves," she added, after a pause, during which no apology came from Miss Carmagie, "but I cannot allow such pernicious sentiments to be avowed in the acaring of Miss Rivers."

"They will do her no harm. Not half so much as ooking her chest over that humdrum chenille stitch. should throw it in the fire, if any one forced me to do it. 30 would she, if she dared."

Anna Rivers looked up, a hot flush upon her face. lid not like the work, but she liked still less to fall under Lady Pope's displeasure.

"I declare it is clearing up 1" called out Miss Carnagie, springing to the window before Lady Pope could find fitting words to retort. "Anna, get your habit on."

"I cannot permit Miss Rivers to go out now," said Lady Pope.

Miss Carnagic turned her back to Lady Pope. "Annu, I say, will you go with me or not? You heard Mr. Ashley say he would ride with us if the rain cleared up."

Anna shook her head and whispered, " I dure do nothing that mamma opposes."

"You ought to have been born a slave, like old Nana," seornfully exclaimed Miss Carnagie; "the blacks on grand papa's estate are under no worse thraiden than you." And Lady Pope was tempted to wish that she had been born slave-driver, if she might have applied the whip to the young lady's shoulders.

Was such a girl likely to find favour with the precis She sat on, in deep indignation, scolding Lady Pope? Anna, who was not in fault, and believing that Miss Carnagi had retired to her own room, to indulge her idle hal it c lying down, or to browbeat Nana. All at once the clutte of horses' feet was heard on the gravel. Lady Pope raise her car, touched her chair, and went whirling away to th window. Riding off, followed by a groom, was Miss Car nagie, in the company of Arthur Ashley.

Every nerve of propriety possessed by Lady Pope wa tingling. Her chair reeled off to the fireplace, and the be was rung violently. It was to summon her brother: bt

Sir Harry had gone to the Sessions at Stopton. For two mortal hours my lady sat, feeding her indignation, and then the runagates entered. Only to increase it. For Miss Carnagie coolly said that they had had a delightful ride, and she should go again whenever she pleased. If Lady Pope forbid Anna Rivers to make one of the party, that the three might play propriety, she had nobody to thank but horself if they went without her.

"How in the world can you have been brought up ?" demanded the astonished Lady Pope.

"Brought up 1" cehoed Miss Carnagie, who was determined not to "give in," "I was with mamma in England for seven years; from four years old till eleven; and then she took me back to Madras with a governess."

But if Miss Carnagie was in disgrace with Lady Pope, she found favour with her guardian. In her wilful ways, Sir Harry saw but charming grace; with her ready speech and her great beauty he was more than fascinated. Miss Carnagie certainly possessed the art of attracting men to her side; no doubt her manners to them were more courteous than those she exhibited to Lady Pope. She wivately told Sir Harry that Lady Pope was an ugly old tyrant, and Sir Harry enjoyed the confidence. His attention to her was growing more pointed than is usual from guardian to ward, and visitors to Ashley whispered, among themselves, that the place would soon have a second mistress. If Lady Pope had only suspected that 1

But it appeared that visitors were reckoning without their host. For Sir Harry's manner suddenly changed. He grew cool in his intercourse with Miss Carmagic, and, adeed, took to holding himself very much aloof altogether rom home society, spending his time abroad, or in his own roms. So much the more pleasing to Miss Carmagic. For r Harry Ashley she cared not; but a passion, strong and ardent as her own nature, had taken root within her for his nophow and heir. From the first moment she saw Arthur Ashley, he had made a deep impression on her. More fascinating, both in looks and manner, than any man she had hitherto known, it scarcely needed the opportunities, which were undoubtedly afforded in abundance, for this impression to grow into love. She already indulged visions of the future, when he should be her husband, hers only and for all time; when he should parade her to the world, his chosen and envied wife; she indulged in visions of her future sway as mistress of Ashley; for Lauretta Carnagie hankered after position, and possessed a love of money and social power. Her life in Madras had been one of nome and luxury: but this same pomp and luxury had made considerable inroads on the fortune of General and Mrs. Carangie, and when they died, the former but three months subsequent to the latter, it was found that their impoverished estate would afford but a few hundreds per annum for their Double its whole amount had hitherto been danghter. So she sought Arthur expended on her dress alone. Ashley's society, or he hers, or perhaps the seeking was mutual; at any rate, they were much together. was scarcely justifiable on Mr. Ashley's part, for an attachment, a real attachment, known to none, subsisted between Almost from the first, Annu himself and Anna Rivers. had detected the pleasure Miss Carnagic took in Mr. Ashley's society, and the hitter pains of jealousy were aroused in her heart. Had this wild Indian girl come to supplant her? It seemed like it. And Anna had no means of showing her resentment, save by absenting herself from Mr. Ashley's presence.

But it happened one warm summer evening that Anna met him in the shrubbery. He stopped and drew her arm within his, and greeted her familiarly and tenderly, as was "Let me alone, Mr. Ashley," she angrily replied. right to treat me so has passed."

"Not passed yet, Anna," he rejoined, retaining her arm; "not until an explanation has taken place between us. Tell me the reason of your recent coldness. Why is it you have

Anna Rivers was superior to coquetry; moreover, she · loved Arthur Ashley too well to include in it; and she

"My conduct has only been regulated by yours," she said. "Ask yourself what that has been,"

"Anna, let us clear up this bugbear between us, I suspect where the offence lies-in my being so much with Miss Carnagie. If this has given you uneasiness, I sincerely beg your pardon. We have been together a great deal: 1 acknowledge it: but the fault has not been wholly mine." "Mine, perhaps ?" resentfully spoke Anna.

"Yes," he laughed, "for leaving me so much to myself; and also—if I may whisper it to you—Miss Carnagie's. She might have sought me less. Oh, Anna, you are a regular oose! These flighty damsels are worth their weight in old to flirt with, but for anything else-excuse me. Why, would not marry Lauretta Carnagie if the East India Company dowered her with all its possessions."

Now if the intelligent reader can imagine him-or herself in Miss Carangio's shoes, they may perhaps picture what might be that young lady's sensations when she heard this candid avowal of Ashley's heir: and hear it she did, for she was on the other side of the shrubbery hedge. All her wild blood, inherited from her half-caste West Indian mother, rose to boiling-water heat; may, more like to bubbles of liquid fire. Never had she suspected that there was aught but common friendship between him and Miss Rivers.

Forgotful of all maidenly reserve, easting aside all delicacy of feeling, her voins tingling, her face glowing, and her splendid eyes flushing as with a tiger's fury, Lauretta Carnagie passed through an opening of the shrubbery, and stood before her rival and Mr. Ashley. Upon which Miss Rivers drew away from the latter, and stood proud and defiant, and the gentleman would have given all his pockets were worth, if some kind gust of wind, stronger than ordinary, had just then soured him aloft, and deposited him in any other spot of this wide carth. Serve you right, Mr. Arthur, for you have been unpardonably sweet upon that immulsive girl. Your conscience is telling you so; and it is of no use to mutter over the advice of the old song now, and register a yow to yourself that you will practically remember it, for evermore henceforth, if your good stars will only get you out of this one scrape-" It is well to be off with the old love before we are on with the new."

"You have been professing to love me; you have been professing to love her," was the address of Miss Carnagie, whilst her frame trembled with passion, and the glow on her cheeks was fading to the hue of the grave. "Which of those pretensions was false, which genuine?"

For perhaps the first time in his life, before a woman, Arthur Ashley quailed, and his tongue forgot its honeyed readiness. Enough to make him. She stood, hot and fiery as her own clime, on one side, bending towards him to devour his answer; whilst on the other, she whom he really loved and had chosen for his bride, was drawn up like a repellent piece of marble.

His senses partially came to him. He took Aum's hand. "Allow me to conduct you to the house," he said, "while I explain to Miss Carnagie. One moment," he deprecatingly added to the latter; "I will not keep you waiting longer."

Anna had no resource but to go, though she would have preferred to hear my gentleman "explain." "A sharp breeze," he whispered to her. "It will be the sooner over. On my soul it is her fault, more than mine: her-foolish vanity has brought it on herself. Still, Anna, I hambly beg you to forgive me."

She did not answer. She only snatched away her land, and sailed on by his side in sullen silence. He saw her indoors, went back again, and Lauretta Carnagie met him.

"One word, Mr. Ashley," she vehemently uttered. "Do you love that girl, Anna Rivers?"

"Miss Rivers and I are old friends," he evasively answered.

"Tamper with me if you dare," she retorted. "I ask if Anna Rivers is anything to you?"

"What the deuce—let it come out—she can't shoot me," disjointly muttered Mr. Arthur. "It is probable that Anna Rivers may sometime be my wife," he said aloud, but in low tones. "Not yet; perhaps not for years to come. But, Lauretta—"

"If you had behaved to me so in my father's house, in our own country; talked to me as you have done, you, nearly a married man; I would have had you scourged by the slaves. Scourged, sir, till you should have borne the narks for life."

Every manly feeling within him was stung to the quick, and he coloured to the roots of his fair hair. "Do not let us quarrel, Lauretta," he said. "Nothing has happened that need interrupt our friendship. If you, or I, ever caught ourselves dreaming that a warmer tie might hereafter unite us, why I suppose we must forget it."

"There is one thing I will never forget," she hissed in his ear—"what you have said this evening. It was well done of you, Arthur Ashley, to speak insultingly of me to her. I will wear those words in my heart until I am avenged."

She stalked away towards the house in her wild anger, and Mr. Ashley, breathing a blessing upon women in general and himself in particular, strode in another direction. "I'll go away for a day or two," thought he, "and give the thing time to blow over."

Revenge Miss Carnagie had spoken of, and revenge she meant to have; how, she did not see or know as yet. Perhaps it was nearer than she could have hoped. By way of a beginning, she went straight to Lady Pope in the drawing-room.

"Are you aware that there is a love-affair going on between Mr. Ashley and your daughter?" she said abruptly.

Tady Pope would have screamed but for compromising her dignity. For Mrs. Wainwright, a visitor at Ashley, stood at her chair-elbow and heard the bold assertion. She waved Miss Carnagic away.

"Did you know that there was a claudestine affair going on between them?" persisted Miss Carmagic, who was not one to be waved away by Lady Pope.

"Where can you have learnt all these shocking words?" demanded Lady Pope, at length. "'Claudestine affair!' Really, Miss Carnagie....."

"Did you know it, I ask?" she pertimeiously interrapted.

"Madam," was the stiff response of Lady Pope, "the word claudestine can never be coupled with my daughter's name. She would enter into no such engagement: I will answer for it. And I know not by what law of politeness you, a young stranger, come into my brother's house and thus presume to comment upon family matters." Saying which, Lady Pope, calling hastily for the help of her maid, ascended to her dressing-room.

"You have committed high treason," laughed Mrs. Wainwright. "It is suspected that Lady Pope's heart is set upon her daughter becoming Lady Ashley. Arthur won't do for her, now that his hopes of succeeding to Ashler are fading."

Miss Carnagie raised her head quickly. "I thought Arthur was the heir to Ashley."

"Pooh, my dear! I would not give two pins for his chance now. Sir Harry is safe to marry again."

"And if he did—who would succeed?" breathlessly usked Miss Carnagic.

"Why, his own children, of course; his eldest son. Don't you understand these things? Arthur Ashley will be ready to out the bride's throat, whoever she may be, for cutting out himself."

Miss Carnagie drew a long breath, and left Mrs. Wainwright without answer. She went to her own room, sent out Nana with an imperious gesture, who happened to be there; sat down, and closed her eyes to think. She was capable of earnest self-communing, possessing the faculty of concentration in an unusual degree. Rapid and vehement in all her ways, her decision was taken ere she had sat there many minutes. "It will keep him out of Ashley," she muttered as she rose: "to do that, I would sacrifice myself to—to—a worse sacrifice than this will be. Wealth and position will at least be mine. And better be an old man's darling than a young man's slave 4" Away she went downstairs towards the dining-room.

"Is Sir Harry in there still?" she inquired of a servant, whom she met near the door. "Mr. Ashley is not with him?"

"Mr. Ashley has just rode off to Brooklands, miss. He thinks of stopping a day or two, and I am now going to put up his carpet-bag and send it after him. Sir Harry is alone."

Lauretta Carnagie opened the dining-room door softly, and closed it after her. It was nearly dusk then, and Sir Harry had left the table, and was sitting in his casy-chair near the large window. He rose up in surprise at right of Miss Carnagie, as she advanced close to him and took up her position against the window-frame. She looked at him, but did not at first speak. Was she considering his personal attractions? They were such as many a woman might have admired. It was true he was no longer to be called young, but not a shade of silver mixed with his glossy hair; not a wrinkle, as yet, defaced his broad forchead. Time had been considerate to Sir Henry Ashley. In that dim, uncertain light, he might have been taken for but a few years past thirty. Miss Carnagic spoke at last, dropping her eyes to the ground.

"I have been thinking how ungrateful I was, so positively to refuse—what you asked me. And I——"

"My dear child," he interrupted, "say no more. I ought not to have hid myself open to a certain refusal. The pain that inflicted brought me to my senses; and if I have since seeluded myself, scarcely meeting you but at meals, it has not been from any resentful feeling towards you, but that I would get over the too warm interest I had felt for you."

Miss Carnagic did not answer: perhaps the purport of Sir Harry's speech was different from what she expected. He continued:

"My wife I married in early life. To say I loved her would be wrong; I never did. My sister wished the match between us; I mistook friendship for love, and fell into it. She was a good wife to me, and our life was calm: I can say no more for it. But when you came, Lauretta, when we had mixed together in habits of intimacy, when I had protected you as my ward, then, indeed, I found what it was to love. I gave way to it without consideration. I forgot that my years had passed their meridian, and that yours were yet in their dawn, and like a fool I hazarded my fate—and met with a refusal. I am speaking now more calmly, you see, than I could at the time."

"But," she resumed in a low tone, "I came this evening to tell you that—I—think I was mistaken as well as hasty."

A silence ensued. When Sir Harry broke it, his voice was hoarse with emotion.

- "I am not sure that I understand—that I dare understand. Lauretta, that one repulsion cost me dear: I will not hazard another. Give me fully to understand what you really mean."
- "Would you be pleased if I say I retract my refusal, and ask you to pardon it?"
  - "Pleased! Lauretta!"
- "That if you will take me with my faults and my wilfulness, I am ready to say you may have me?"
  - "You are not deceiving me?" he murmured.
- "I nover deceive," she answered, with so passionate a touch of soorn in her tone, that one in the secret might know she was thinking of how she had been deceived by Arthur Ashley.

He flung his arms round her, and gave utterance to the eep love she had excited in his heart: all the stronger for a recent suppression. That a passion so powerful should have arisen in Sir Henry Ashley, with his nearly fifty years! But so it was.

- "I trust I am guilty of no dishonour in thus winning you for myself—of no breach of the confidence imposed in me by your father," he said, in a musing manner, half to himself, half to her. "My position is one to which even he could not object, and the contrast in our years is, it seems to me, a consideration for you alone."
  - " For no one else," she answered.
- "Lauretta I how we may deceive ourselves I" he went on, "Shall I tell you a notion that has recently possessed me?—that you and Arthur were becoming attached to each other. You were so much together. Poor fellow I this will be a blow to his prospects. Had I foreseen Lady Ashley's premature death, I never would have adopted him, or encouraged the notion of his inheritance."

A curious expression passed over her face. But at this moment, after a sharp knocking, as with a stick, the door was flung open, and who should enter but Lady Pope, her crutch on one side of her, her maid on the other, the latter bearing a fluring candle. Setting that on the table, and her mistress on a chair, she retired from the room. Sir Harry came forward, his brow darkening: "To what accident was he to attribute Lady Pope's intrusion?"

Lady Pope did not tell him. We can. She was sitting with her dressing-room door open, partly for air, partly that she might see all the passing and repassing in the passages, when a servant came by with a packed carpet-bag, which she recognized as Arthur's, and she demanded where that was going to. To Brooklands, the man answered. Mr. Arthur was gone over there.

Up went her ladyship's curiosity. What was he gone there for, so suddenly? Did Sir Harry know? Where was Sir Harry?

Sir Harry was still in the dining-room. Miss Carnagio was with him.

Miss Carnagie 1 echoed Lady Pope. The servant must be mistaken.

Oh no. Ho had seen her go in with his own eyes, and close the door.

This was a climax for Lady Pope. Why, what possessed this girl, that she was turning the whole house topsy-turvy? To and shut herself in with Sir Harry before he had left the dining-room! She would tell her, this moment, what she thought of such conduct. "Send my maid here instantly!" she exclaimed to the servant.

So the maid and the crutch and Lady Pope, and a candle to guide her ladyship's steps, for the staircase lamps were not yet lighted, sailed into the dining-room, and Sir Harry inquired to what cause he was to attribute the intrusion.

"I came to ascertain to what cause may be attributed hors," was Lady Pope's sareastic rejoinder. "Really, Sir Harry-and I am glad to have the opportunity of saying this to you in her presence—unless Miss Carnagie can conform to the usages of decent society, I would recommend you to resign your guardianship, and suffer her to depart."

"In what way has Miss Carnagie transgressed them?" demanded Sir Harry,

"In what way does she not? A most unpurdonable transgression is her coming here, at this hour, in this room, and remaining in it with you."

"I shall not eat her," said Sir Harry.

"Sir Harry Ashley," resumed Lady Pope, in a crushing voice, "if you deem my visit here an intrusion to be noticed in words, by what name can you designate hers? may be forgetful of forms and propriety-men generally are-but it is my place to see that they are observed by, and towards, Miss Carnagie. Miss Carnagie, you will oblige me by quitting this room with me. Sir Harry, call in my maid. I told her to wait outside."

"Miss Carnagie remains here with me," returned Sir Harry. "We will join you when ten is ready. You seem to overlook the fact that, as guardian and ward, we may have business to transact together."

" Not at unseasonable hours," persisted the exasperated Lady Pope. "If Miss Carnagie remains here, I shall. is really quite—quite improper, Sir Harry. I'll thank you to order the chandelier lighted, if we are to stay. That candle hurts my eyes."

Sir Harry was provoked—as he could be, very much so, on occasions. "Lady Pope," he said, "you are assuming rather too much. I, as Miss Carnagie's guardian, am a competent judge for her of what is proper. That I shall guard her from what is improper you may well believe, when I inform you that in her you see my future wife."

Had poor Lady Pope received a dose of chloroform she could not have been more completely overcome. Her mouth opened, her chin fell, down dropped her arms, and down went her crutch with a rattle. Sir Harry had drawn Miss Carnagie's arm within his, and they both stood facing her.

"The future wife-yours?" were the first words she gasped.

"My own dear future wife, Lady Ashley."

"Are you bereft of your senses, Henry Ashley, or am I?" she inquired. "If I am not, I would ask if you have reflected on the miserable consequences that this will entail? The cruelty, the injustice to Arthur Ashley?"

"Enough," peremptorily interrupted Sir Henry, as ne flung open the door and summoned the maid, who stood very close to it, to take away her mistress, "Order tea," he said: "we will soon be with you."

Lady Pope meekly obeyed, and prepared to leave with the servant. Her spirit was completely stricken down, and lay (as may be said) in dust and ashes. But first of all she beckened Sir Harry to her, and, drawing him down, whispered in his car:

"Henry, my brother, one word---for your own sake. Is this inevitable?"

He nodded.

"Oh, think better of it! If it he possible, break it off: She is not a woman to make any husband happy. She will make you miscrable."

"No more," he coldly said. But she held him still.

"Henry, do you hear me? mismable."

"I hear," was the indifferent, almost contemptuous reply.

The neighbourhood was electrified when it heard that Sil Harry Ashley was to marry his ward; not only electrified, but shocked. Sir Harry, for the last twelve or fifteen months, had been looked upon as a high prize in the matrimonial lottery, and every one was ready to devour Miss Carnagic alive. She came in for the usual share of abuse: some ventured to speak against her to Sir Harry. She was too young, and too wilful, and too poor, and too proud, and too——a great many other things; but Sir Harry was too much for them all, and held to his bargain.

The wedding took place in Liverpool in the month of October, Miss Carnagie being married from the house of her late father's friends there, Nabob and Mrs. Call. Annu Rivers was bridesmaid, and perhaps she was the only one, save the parties themselves, who rejoiced in the union. But she could not overcome the miserable jealousy Miss Carnagie had caused to her heart, or the general discomfort she had brought to Ashley.

Arthur Ashley was joked, rallied, and condoled with. It was certainly a grievous disappointment, but he behaved magnanimously, and would not show it. Sir Harry handed over to him the writings of Thorneliff, a small estate, worth a few hundreds a year, and promised something about a government appointment. "Don't thank me for Thorneliff," he said; "I'll listen to nothing in the shape of thanks. I feel as if I had injured you, and this is a sop in the pan. But cheer up, my boy; who knows? you may be Sir Arthur yet."

Arthur answered good-humouredly that the chances were against it. He knew they were. And he knew also his conscience was telling it to him at that very moment—that he fading away of his inheritance had been partly brought bout by his own folly—that he had himself to thank for aying lost Ashley.

CHAPTER III.

"RYLE THE SECOND."

NEW YEAR'S DAY, frosty, bright, and cold: just the day for a sharp walk on the hard country roads, giving a healthy glow to the blood and to the face, very agreeable in midwinter. A gentleman, who was winding up a slight ascent in a picturesque part of England, appeared to find it so. He marched along with a hearty step, aided by a right good will and a stout stick. His face was browned, as by foreign travel; he was no longer young, and he stopped, almost incessantly, to note various points in the landscape with a curiosity which seemed to say the locality was strange to him.

Not entirely strange, but it was thirty years since he had witnessed it. Presently, as he came to two roads, he halted in indecision: and no wonder, for one of them had been made recently. "Can you tell me, sir," he inquired of another passenger, who now overtook him, "which of these two roads will take me to Ashley?"

"To the house or to the village?".

"The house. Sir Harry's."

was a little, spare man, nearing forty, with a red, good-humoured face. An ample blue cloak covered his person nearly to the feet, which were clad in dress-boots, black and shining. As they walked on together, a carriage came bowling along behind them. Its immates appeared to be richly attired.

"That makes the fourth carriage which has passed me this afternoon," cried the bronzed stranger. "Are they bound for Ashley, do you know?"

"To be sure," returned the little man. "To-day is a grand day with Sir Harry Ashley. The christening of his

"Why, what do you mean?" uttered the other. "I thought Sir Harry and his wife were childless."

"They were until—let me see—just three months ago, On the 1st of last October, I introduced their son into the world."

his companion. "You cannot be Josiah (lav?"

"I am Josiah Gay's son. My father has been dead these twelve years. And I stand in his place, the village Alson-laning"

"Then you must be young Jos!"

"No, poor Jos is gone also. I am Ned. But you have the advantage of me."

Harry with one's looks. And, otherwise, you would not remember me, for you were an archin in pinafores when I left. Your brother might, were he alive. He and I and larry Ashley—reckless Hall—have had many a spree together: robbed more orelards and done more midnight amage than I should care to tell of now. To think of all Ashley, the third son, coming into the title before he we six-and-twenty."

"Perhaps you are Philip Hayne? Mr. Hayne,"
"Major Hayne, at your service," returned the other, ing his hat, and disclosing a head nearly bald. "Thirty is have I served the East India Company, and only got my majority to retire upon. Well, well; we should be thankful for small mercies in this life: and I have neither chick nor child."

"Wish I could say the same," cried Mr. Gay, drawing his good-humoured face into a comical expression. count ten, and there may be ten more behind 'em, for aught I know."

"All of us to our tastes," returned the Major. had half the number I should run away the first wet morning. Another carriage !-- two! They are coming thick and threefold. By the way, though, what has Lady Ashley been about, to keep Sir Harry out of an heir twenty or thirty years, and then give him one at last?"

"Twenty or thirty years! Oh, I see; you are thinking of the late Lady Ashley. Sir Harry lost his first wife four or five years ago. This is his second."

"Whew 1"

"Last autumn three years he married this one, was a girl of twenty, his ward, too young for him. And he may thank luck, more than anything else, that he has nn heir at all."

"Ah 2"

"She is of wilful temper, violent to a degree. Three several times have there been hopes of a child, and the expectations have always been destroyed from some imprudent conduct on my lady's part. Once, it was through a fit of raging passion. When she ought to sit still, she will go galloping out on horseback, for a day at a stretch: and when told that exercise is necessary to her, she will not take it, but lounge on a sofa from week's end to week's end. However, the child is born."

"Whose nose does it put out of joint? Semebody's, of course."

" Have you forgotten Ryle Ashley? Sir Harry's ne:

"Not I. I never forget anyhody or anything : man, child, horse, dog."

"Ryle Ashley's gone: died the same year as poor Jos. His eldest son, Arthur, was then the heir. Sir Harry brought him up at Ashley to all the expectations."

"And this young shaver cuts him out! Very annoying to him, no doubt, but there are worse misfortunes at sea. Had I a score of boys, I would rather see them carve out their own fortunes than inherit one ready-made. What sort of a genus is Arthur? Has his wits about him?"

"Clever and keen as was Ryle, his father. And he had the brains of the family. Arthur Ashley will rise in the political world, if he minds what he is about. There is a talk of his going into the House for some close borough. He has been secretary to one of the ministers these three years."

"Better for him than waiting for Ashley. I should like to see him."

"He arrived here to-day at mid-day: I saw him as he passed through the village. He is come to stand to the new heir. Lady Pope is outrageous, I hear, that they have not asked her to be godinother. But she and Lady Ashley do not hit it off together. She has been but once at Ashley since Sir Henry's second marriage, and left in a rage at the end of the third day: some breeze between her and the new lady."

"Who is Lady Pope?"

"Sir Harry's sister. Formerly Bessy Ashley. A widow

"What! did she marry? Why, she was nearly an old maid when I left."

"She married twice. A Captain Rivers the first time. Sir Ralph Pope the second. Here we are! The house is not changed. By the way, though, Major Hayne, how came you here on foot? Where from?"

"The railway station. Stopton. I hate your close flys and your omnibuses, and I have not learned idleness abroad—as too many do. I purpose going over the Continent on foot, when I have said How-d'ye-do to what old friends I can muster in England. Rather an unseasonable moment to break in upon Sir Henry: but he will not mind that if he is what plain Hal Ashley used to be."

Not a whit altered in heart and hospitality, only in years. He grasped Major Hayne's hands with a delight he did not attempt to hide; and when the latter put forth his travelling attire, as a plea for not attending the august ceremonies of the day, Sir Harry laughed at the idea of so frivolous an excuse. He linked his friend's arm within his, and proudly paraded him before his assembled guests in the saloon. "The old friend of my early years," he said to them; "the closest friend I ever could boast of. Lauretta," Sir Harry continued, as they halted before a young, dark, handsome lady, "this is Major Hayne, the companion of my youth."

"A fine woman," whispered the Major. "Who is she?"
Sir Harry smiled. "Your coming has turned my head," he replied; "it was an introduction all on one side. I should have said, my wife, Lady Ashley."

And now, the circuit of the room passed, the Major drew aside. Sir Harry went forward to receive other guests, and the stranger made good use of his eyes. It was his enstom. He was regarding a gentleman who had just come in, and whose appearance particularly attracted his attention. A young, elegant-looking man, with a large proportion of intellect stamped on his well-shaped head and expansive brow. But as Major Hayne looked, he suddenly, in the fair complexion, the grey eye, and the handsome features, detected a resemblance to the Ashley family.

"Ryle's son! It must be! the disappointed heir! I'll go and speak to the lad."

He did so, laying his hand upon the young man's shoulder. "Unless I am much mistaken, you are your father's son."

Arthur Ashley wheeled round. But there was a quaintness in the stranger's smile, an affectionate regard in his eye, which won his favour. Where could be have spring from, this brown, travel-soiled man, with his unsuitable attire?

"I am the son of Ryle Ashley," Arthur said.

"And Ryle Ashley was a partner in my hoyish scrapes, Not so entirely as your Uncle Hal: but we have had many a wild frolic together. I was ringleader, for Ryle was a year or two my junior. So he, poor fellow, is gone, I find, and I am left, well and hearty. Should it ever be your fate, Ryle, to try your luck under a smoking sun, adhere strictly to temperance and simplicity of living. That is the secret which has seared away ailments from me."

"I am not Ryle, sir; I am Arthur Ashley."

"Ay, yes. I knew it. But your face is what your father's was when I went away, and I dreamt I was talking to Ryle again."

"I think you must be Captain Hayne," will Arthur, who had been ransacking his memory.

"With another step in rank tacked on to it. The captain as subsided into major. But, as we are on the subject of mk, how do you hear the loss of yours ?" "I have lost none."

"The anticipation. You were Sir Harry's heir."

"Why, do you know," returned Arthur, becoming nimated and speaking in a confidential tone, "I am glad it now. With Ashloy in prospective, there is too much ar that I should have frittered away my days 1 have led a e of indolence, as Sir Harry does. With the necessity for exertion, came the exertion; and the love of it. I would not exchange my present life—and I can assure you it is no sinceure—for the renewed heirship of Ashley."

"You'll do-Ryle the second," cried Major Hayne.

The christening was over, and they sat around the banquet-table. A goodly group. Lady Ashley, in her young beauty, at its head, Sir Henry, with his fifty years, facing her. Nabob Call and Arthur Ashley, the child's godfathers, sat on Lady Ashley's either hand; the Nabob a surly old East Indian, popperly in temper as his favourite diet, capsicums and cayenne. It had been a marvel to the gossips that Arthur Ashley, a younger branch of the family, and a man without county influence, should have been fixed upon to stand to the child, when so many, far above him in position, would have been proud to render the service to their old friend Sir Henry Asldey. Lady Ashley chose the sponsors. How little did they think, who sat around her that day, and marked the ready smiles on her face, the courteous attention to her guests, the witty reparted which ever and anon rose to her lips-how little did they think, that hatred and revenge towards one of those sponsors was the ruling thought of her life! She had once loved Arthur Ashley, Sir Harry's presumptive heir, with all the passion of a warm and ill-regulated heart. Not from love did she hasten to become Sir Harry Ashley's wife, but that Arthur might be bowled out of the succes-Three years, and her hopes had come to naughtthree years of feverish impatience; but now her revenge was gratified, her child was the heir to Ashley. And when Sir Harry had thanked her for naming his nephew (whom he had not thought of) as one of the heir's sponsors, she broke into a bursh, wild haugh; but she did not tell her linsband that it was with the view of giving pain and mortification to Mr. Ashley that she had brought him to be present at the christening of the child who was his supplanter.

With the dessert, the infant was brought in. The nurse made the circuit of the table with him. He lay in her arms, asleep, a bundle of embroidery, whose face might have been composed of lace and white ribbon, for all else that could be seen of it.

The gentlemen charged their glasses to the brim, and the company rose. "Long life to Carnagie Call, the heir to Ashley I" Not one drank it more heartily than he who stood at Lady Ashley's left hand, the supplanted inheritor. There lingered, in truth, no regret on his mind, and that revengeful lady little knew Arthur Ashley.

"What did they name the child?" whispered Major Hayne to his next-door neighbour, a lively young lady of thirty, when the applause was over.

"Carnagie Call."

" Carnagie Call! Is that English or Dutch?"

Lady Maria laughed, "Perhaps it is Hindustanee. was a Miss Carnagie, of Madras, and Naboh Call has passed his life there. The child is named after them."

Somewhat later, the nurse was sitting before the nursery fire, undressing the infant, when the door softly opened and Lady Maria Kerrison came in. "How d'you do, Eliza?" she said. "I have come to see this prodigy of a child." It may be explained that the nurse had been children's maid to Lady Maria's young half-sisters, and the Counters of Kerrison (Lord Kerrison's second wife) wishing to part with her, had strongly recommended her to Lady Ashley. The servant rose and placed a chair for Lady Maria, if she chose to sit down, but she stood looking at the child.

A miserable little infant, as brown as a herry, long, halfstarved arms and legs, a seowl on its dark brow, and a whining ory that was rarely still. It was whining pitcoundy now.

" Eliza!" uttered the young lady in the surprise of the noment, "what a frightful child! It is a perfect scarerow."

"I call it quite an object," replied the nurse. rith its lanky limbs and thin body, it looks all legs and vings."

"It is like its mother, though," said Lady Maria, atten-ively regarding the face.

- "An ugly likeness, my lady. It will never have her good looks. But there's one thing it is like her in," added he servant, dropping her voice, as if fearful the walls should hear, "and that's in temper."
  - "Will it live, do you think, Eliza?"
- "I should say not. Though sometimes these skeletons of children fill out and-"

Eliza ceased speaking, for who should sail into the room but Lady Ashley, Mrs. Call, and Lady Kerrison, the child's godmother.

"A bountiful infant !" rapturously cried Mrs. Call, who had a great aversion to children, and had never yet been able to distinguish one from another. "You ought to be proud of your charge, nurse?"

"I am, ma'am. It is a perfect love, as I often tell my lady. And got its manna's eyes."

"Nam says I was like it when I was a child," broke in Lady Ashley to Mrs. Call. "Do on think I was?"

" Very much so," promptly replied Mrs. Call, not, however, having the slightest recollection on the subject.

The whole of this time the chile was meaning its pitcous mosn, and the visitors turned to leave the room. Kerrison lingered for a moment.

I never saw so thin "Does it get enough to ent, Eliza? a child."

"It cats enough for two, my huly."

"And the more it eats, the thinner it becomes," interposed Lady Maria. "Eliza says it's all bones and feathers,"

"Bones and feathers t" cohoed Lady Kerrison. "Frathers t" "Oh, Lady Maria!" uttered the servant, "I never said so. I said all legs and wings,"

"Logs and wings, that was it I" laughed Lady Maria. "I knew it was something that made me think of birds, Good night, Eliza. I wish you more luck with the young gontleman."

Arthur Ashley stood in the drawing-room, his cup of coffee in his hand, talking to Lady Maria Korrison. uncle came up and drow him apart,

"I have had no time to ask you anything, Arthur, should have managed to get here before to-day." You

"I could not. Lady Pope____"

"I know, I know," hastily interrupted Sir Harry, as if there were something in the subject he wished to avoid, " Has anything been decided about your marriage? Anna will be tired of waiting."

Arthur Ashloy was about to answer, when he perceived that Lady Ashley was standing close to him on the other side, listening. "I have other things to think of," he shortly said, and moved forward to take Lady Maria

But the following morning, when they were alone, he himself introduced the subject to his uncle. "I have been thinking—and Anna—that if all goes well till the end of minmer, we shall try our luck together. What with one ource and another, I make out seven or eight hundred a ear, and it is of no use waiting. Anna is willing to

"Enough to begin upon," said Sir Harry; "more than I id my wife had, before Ashley unexpectedly dropped in.

But why could you not have told me of this last night, when I asked you about it?"

"One does not like to speak of such things in a crowded drawing-room," was Arthur Ashley's evasive reply. How could he tell his uncle that a feeling of delicacy towards her, who, he had reason to believe, had once passionately level him, prevented his speaking of his own marriage in her presence—although she had long been the wife of another?

CHAPTER IV.

OLD HANNAH.

Sir Henry Ashley sat one morning alone. It was near mid-day, but his wife, adhering to the idle habits of h Eastern childhood, rarely rose until late. Four years ha passed since the christening of the heir—and he was the her still. A sickly, unhappy-looking little wight, as brown an thin as ever, but possessing a most precocious mind. A the clock struck twelve, Lady Ashley entered with her two children, Carnagie and his fair and lovely little sister Blanche. The little ones were dressed to go out.

"This is quite a spring day, so warm for March," observed Lady Ashley. "I am going to send the children down to Linden, and let them dine there."

"Oh 1" screamed out young Carnagie, "I like Linden. I can make as much noise as I like there."

"Make the most of it to-day, then, my boy," cried Sir Henry. "It will be about your last chance. They must take their farewell of Linden," he added to his wife; "I have received a letter from Arthur this morning."

"What have Arthur Ashley's letters to do with our children?" demanded Lady Ashley, in no pleasant tone.

"A great deal, so far as Linden goes. Arthur and his wife are coming to live at it themselves."

Lady Ashley's eyes flashed fire. "Coming to live at Linden!" she exclaimed. "And will you permit it?"

"I have no authority in the matter," returned Sir Harry Ashley. "Linden belongs to Arthur."

"I don't care who it belongs to," was the intemperate rejoinder of his lady. "Linden has always been ours, to use for the benefit of our children, and it shall remain so still."

Sir Harry began to whistle: rather a favourite amusement of his. He never would quarrel with his wife, and it was his great resource when she spoke in terms of provocation—as she frequently did.

- "How dare Arthur Ashley interfere with our arrangements?" she began again.
- "My dear, do be reasonable," urged Sir Harry: "you know the circumstances as well as I do. Linden was a pretty, unpretending little place in my father's time, as it is now, jutting upon the edge of the park, and when its proprietor offered it for sale, my father was too glad to buy it. Of course we all thought he intended it to go with the estate, but he left it to Lady Pope, who was not married then. I believe Sir Arthur made her give a sort of promise that it should not eventually be separated from Ashley. However, she has willed it to Arthur, and there's an end of it."
- "Linden was ours," flercely retorted Lady Ashley. "Who says it was your sister's?"
- "Why, Lauretta, you knew it was hers! you must have heard so fifty times. I only rented it from her."
- "I did not hear it, I did not know it. What have I to do with the details of the estate?"
- "Well," coldly returned Sir Harry, "when Ludy Pope died, last November, I informed you of the contents of her will upon my return from the funeral, and that Linden was bequeathed to Arthur. I am sure I thought you would be delighted to hear that Arthur and Mrs. Ashley were coming to Tinden. I went there this morning, after breakfast, t see about some alterations he wants made, and it was running in my head, all the way there and back, what an agreeabl companion Anna would be for you. I cannot say, though but that I am surprised at Arthur's fixing on Linden a a residence. In the first place, the house is small; in th second, I don't well see how he will get on with hi parliamentary matters, so far away from town."

Lady Ashley did not immediately answer. This place Linden, had been used by Sir Henry for many years a the dairy-farm, and Lady Ashley had been in the frequen habit of sending her two children with their attendants to the house for the whole day. She imagined that the change and the exercise were of benefit to Carragie; and besides the noise of children at home waged perpetual war with her nerves.

"If you do not stop Arthur Ashley's coming, you have no love for your own children," she resumed, in a voice of concentrated passion.

Her husband laughed. "Lauretta, don't be childish. Arthur has announced his determination to reside at Linden, and it is not possible for me to interfere, even by a hint. Our children will do as well without Linden as with it. And they can go there sometimes: Arthur's young ones will be rare playmates for them."

136 My children shall never mix with Arthur Ashley's," she retorted, with a pale, determined lip-

"Never mix with Arthur Ashley's !" repeated Sir Henry, in astonishment. "What do you mean, Lauretta?"

"Never. For I hate him, and all who belong to him."

Sir Henry put on his hat, with a sigh, and went out : he saw she was going into one of her unmanageable humours. Poor Sir Harry Ashley ! He had found his sister's temper, when she ruled at Ashley, inimical to his comfort, but he had scarcely changed for the better in that respect when be made Lauretta Carnagie his wife.

Not until July did Mr. and Mrs. Ashley arrive at Linden. It took some months to put the place in order for them, and Arthur could not leave town sooner. He wrote M.P. to his name now, and was the right hand, under the rose, of Lord Swaytherealm, the greatest man in the Lower House. Sir Harry was there to welcome them, but not Lady Ashley. On the following Sunday afternoon, however, the two families met together, near the seeluded cottage of Watson the gamekeeper. Watson's mother, an old woman of five-and-seventy, was sunning herself outside, on the bench, when Mr. and Mrs. Ashley and their eldest child came up. Mrs. Ashley, a very affable young woman, but just now in delicate health, sat down by her side, glad of the rest. Almost at the same moment, Sir Henry Ashley, his wife, and Master Carnagic also appeared in view.

"Do you remember me, Hannah ?" inquired Mrs. Ashley.
Of course not, at first, for old Hannah was growing dim of sight, and had not seen her for several years.

"You remember me?" interposed Arthur.

"Remember you, Master Arthur!" reiterated old Hannah;
'I must forget myself before I forget you."

"Well—this lady is my wife. And you know I married Anna Rivers. She was a favourite of yours, in days gone by."

The old woman's face lighted up with intelligence, and when the bustle occasioned by the greeting of Sir Henry Ashley had subsided, she beckened forward the little boy by Mrs. Ashley's side.

"What do they ca' ye, my bonny bairn?" she inquired.

He was a gentle child of three years, with the fair curls and bright Saxon features of the Ashley race. When he was made to comprehend the question—for though it was fifty years since old Hannah came to Ashley, she had never entirely abandoned her Scotch tongue he answered timidly:

"Rylo Ashley."

"Then tak' care o' yoursel', my bairn : tak' pude care o' bim, Miss Anna," she added, looking at Mrs. Ashley, "for as sure as ye all stan' round me, he'll be one day Chief a' Ashley,"

"You are mistaking the children," intercapted Lady Ashley, in a cold, proud tone, as she pushed forward Carnagic towards Hannah. "This is Sir Harry's son, the heir to Ashley,"

"Nae, nae, my feddy," she answered, laying her hand with a fond, pitying gesture upon little Carnagie's straight black hair, "he's no born to be the inheritor of Ashley. Have ye mue heard the tradition, that there's only three names that can inherit Ashley? Arthur, Henry, and Ryle; each name in its ain proper turn, and nac to supersede the other: have ye mae heard it? Sir Harry kens well that it has always been so. Sir Harry, why did you mae name your son Ryle ? "

Shades of anger, perplexity, and deep, deep paleness passed over Lady Ashley's dark face. Sir Harry had proposed that name for his son; urged it; but she in her strong self-will had insisted on calling the child Carongie. "Ryle was the name of my favourite brother, Arthur's father," he had said. The more reason, had persisted I ady Ashley, for its not being given to her child.

Sir Harry laughed now, jokingly at old Hannah. "We have come to days of enlightenment, Hounah," he said, "and have done with ghosts and traditions. Sir Carnagie Ashley will do for the nineteenth century."

Hannuh shook her head. "Ye ken weel, Sir Harry, that sice, when ye were a random lad o' nineteen, ye fell into an unlucky scrape. Nothing but money would get ye out of it, and that ye had not got; and ye did not dore to tell your father, Sir Arthur. I could not help ye, but I told ye to keep a good heart, for that you would surely come some time to be the laird o' Ashley. I told ye that Henry came next to Arthur in the succession, and Ryle after that, and then it went back to Arthur again. You laughed at me; for ye had two brothers, older than you were, fine, healthy youths, and likely to live. But in a few years ye found that I had told ye truth. You should ha' named your boy Ryle."

"We will name the next so," was the baronet's good-humoured roply.

"Ye may never have another. But I think ye are mocking at me, Sir Harry, as ye did in your young days. What did I tell yon, Mr. Arthur, amaist half a score year agone?" she continued, turning to Mr. Ashley. "It was the day ye sheltered in here from the thunderstorm, ye mind, when ye were wearing the mourning fresh for your father. Ye were saying ye would do this to the estate and ye would do that when it was yours. Do ye mind now what I said to ye?"

"To be sure!" cried Arthur, humouring the old lady. "You told me not to count upon Ashley, for that to succeed Sir Harry! should have been named Ryle, and that if no Ryle arose to succeed him, the title would lapse."

"I thought it would lapse," she went on. "When Mr. Ryle, your father, died in Sir Harry's lifetime, I thought nothing else but that it would lapse with Sir Harry. But now there's another Ryle arisen in your son." Is that why yo mamed him so, Mr. Arthur?"

"No 1" almost fiercely interrupted Arthur. "I named him Ryle in remembrance of my father. I truly hope Sir Harry's own children may succeed him."

"My bairn," said the old woman, taking little Ryle's band in hers, who had stood quietly at her knee, looking into her wrinkled face with his clear blue eyes, "when ye are a great man and are called Sir Ryle, perhaps yo may have a little boy of your ain. Mind what I say to ye, name him Arthur, and dinna forget it. If ye are alive still, Miss Anna—and it is to be hoped yo will be for many a year after that—see that it is done."

"I think you are fanciful," said Mrs. Ashley to the old lady, in a good-natured but unbelieving tone, as if she would not combat too rudely her curious prejudices, "What difference can a name make in the succession to Ashley? The thing is not possible."

"We don't see why such things should be and such not, Miss Anna; there are matters beyond our ken. I could tell you stranger things that run in families than this, but I could nae tell ye why they run; no, nor their ain selves, nor their kith nor kin; and we may plan and we may talk, but they can nae be turned aside. Sir Harry kens, and Sir Arthur kenned it afore him, that none but those three mames, each in its turn, have ever been the lairds o' Ashley—nae matter how improbable at one time their succession may have seemed."

"If you intend to remain here, Sir Harry, I shall take by leave," interposed Lady Ashley, in a suppressed tempest passion.

They all walked away, Sir Harry and his nephew making merry over old Hannah's solemn belief in the infallibility of a name. To give an instant's serious thought to such "trash"—Sir Harry's expression—would have been inurious to the dignity of all the Ashleys. Yet what the ld woman had stated was an incontrovertible fact—that nee the creation of the haronetey, two hundred years fore, the holders of it had been Arthur, Henry, Ryle, in succession down to the present date. The two children walked together on the grass. They presented a complete contrast: the one, lowering and sullen in countenance, dark as his own nature, the other, all smiles and good humour. Lady Ashley repeatedly called Carnagic, as if she would detach him from little Ryle, but Carnagic had inherited his mother's self-will and declined to listen.

"What are you going to do with yourself to-morrow?" demanded Sir Harry of his nephew.

"I intend to have a day's fishing. There used to be capital trout in the stream. Do you over trouble them?"

"Not I. I see no fun in the sport. If-"

A sharp cry, as of pain, interrupted them, and they looked round for the children. Carnagic Ashley, whose ire had been raised by something which he could not himself explain, was licating Ryle unmercifully.

"Hallo!" cried Mr. Ashley. "Carnagie! What, beat a boy less than yourself t".

"Carnagie !" shouted Sir Harry; "lave done, sir! Carnagie!"

It was of no use to call. Carnagie, in his fury, could not hear. The little child was screaming, as much from terror as from pain, for the blood was streaming from his nose on to his dress, but Carnagie still hit on. Mr. Ashley, who was up with them quicker than his uncle, seized Carnagie by the waist, and deposited him a few yards off, where he stamped and screamed. Sir Harry stormed at him, but Lady Ashley stood as immovable as a statue, looking at her son with intense satisfaction. Politeness kept Mr. and Mrs. Ashley from saying what they thought of Master Carnagie, and the parties separated for their different homes.

"Don't you allow that old creature a pension?" in-

" Yes."

"Then discontinue it."

"Out of my power, Lady Ashley. My father commenced it before his death, and left the charge to me. It is a sacred trust,"

"She ought to be turned off the estate. How dured she insult us to our faces—saying that Carragic would never succeed you?"

"For pity's sake don't let that trouble you," returned Sir Harry, laughing heartily. "Old Hammh was always full of her Scotch superstitions: she would make you believe in second sight, if you would listen to her. As worthy a woman, she, as ever lived, and was of quite a superior family, though she lowered herself by marrying my father's gamekeeper. I wish, Lauretsa," he added more seriously, "you would go occasionally amongst the people on the estate: I think you might find it of advantage to you."

"The specimen I have met to-day has not been an inviting one," was the repellent reply of Lady Ashley.

CHAPTER V.

THE BUTTERFLY CHASE.

Mr. Ashley sat broiling himself upon the edge of the trout stream, and by his side, quiet as a mouse, sat little Ryle. Ere long, Sir Henry Ashley, holding Carnagie by the hand, came behind them. Ryle, who could not forget yesterday, shrank close to his father.

"What sport, Arthur?"

"Not any, yet. I had letters to write to-day, and did not come as soon as I thought of doing. There's a bite I hush !

stop !"

There really was, the first bite. It was a poor little trout, not worth the landing, but Mr. Ashley secured him, almost with the delight of a schoolboy. It was nearly two years since he had enjoyed a day's fishing, and then not for trout. Carnagic and Ryle watched the process with interest. When Mr. Ashley threw his line into the water again, Sir Harry prepared to leave.

"I want to stay," said Master Carnagle.

"You cannot, Carnagic. I must take you home."

"Let him stay if you like," interposed Arthur. "Pil take care of him. Provided," he added, turning to young Carnagie, "he promises to sit still and does not quarrel."

"No, I believe I must take him," rejoined Sir Harry.

"His mother will find fault with me if I do not."

He walked away, dragging by the hand the unwilling boy, who kept his head turned round in the direction of the stream. When they came to the park, where the trees would shut out all view of it, Carmgie's feet became glued to the ground, and he subbed out that he would go back to see the fish caught.

"The fish are ugly," said Sir Harry.

Carnagie's sobs increased to a roar; and Sir Harry, never famed for his resolution, yielded. "Well, ran back," he said, "and sit down close to little Ryle. I will send Patience to fetch you presently. And hark ye, Carnagie if you are troublesome to Mr. Ashley, or ill-natured to Ryle, I will never let you stay anywhere again."

Not waiting for a second permission, the boy darted straight back towards Mr. Ashley. Sir Harry watched him halfway across the plain, then turned, entered the park, and was lost to view. At the same moment, Carmagia was attracted by the sight of a butterfly, and, postponing the fish-catching, child-like, for this new attraction, he changed his course and went after it. It drew him away to the right, bearing rather towards the stream. A curve in the banks soon took him beyond view of Arthur Ashley, even supposing the latter had known he was there, and looked after him, which he did not.

It was a famous chase. Now the butterfly would descend with fluttering wings, and Carnagie, raising his hands, would deem it in his clasp. Once he thought it was his, and took off his hat to throw over it; but away it soured, high and far, as if attracted by the scent of the distant beau-field, which went stretching down to the stream, and away and away flew the child after it, drawing nearer and nearer toward

Mr. Ashley sat on, at his sport, trying to book the tish, his head running upon hooks of another sort, in the policical world. Ryle began to show symptoms of weariness. His legs had never been still so long before. "Here's some one coming," he said to his father.

It was a young woman, Carnagie's nurse. "If you please, sir," she said, advancing close to them, "where is Mustor Ashley?"

"Master Ashley!" returned Arthur, who did not know the girl. "Do you mean Master Carnagie Ashley?"

"Yes, sir. Sir Harry has just come home, and sent me here for him. He said he was fishing along with you, sir."

Arthur opened his eyes in wonder. "There is some error," he returned. "I think you must have misunder-stood Sir Harry. He did not leave the child here."

"I am sure, sir, I did not misunderstand what Sir Harry said," was the reply of Patience. "My lady was not pleased, and Sir Harry said Master Ashley had made such a hullabaloo—as he called it—to stop and watch the fish caught, that he was forced to let him. And he ordered me to bring him home now, whether he cried or not."

"It is very extraordinary," exclaimed Mr. Ashley. "The child did want to remain, and I offered to take care of him, but Sir Harry said Lady Ashley would prefer his going home, and he took him away. Carnagie!" shouted Mr. Ashley, at the top of his voice, as he retreated from the bank and looked round. Carnagie!"

No answer. The hum of the summer's afternoon, of the buzzing insects, of the gleeful birds, was in the air; but there was no other answer.

"You had better go back and inquire of Sir Harry where he left him," he said to the maid. "It was not here."

Accordingly she did so, making good speed, and Mr. Ashley resumed his sent and his rod. He was not in the least uneasy, and the matter faded from his mind, for he believed the mistake to be the servant's: that she had misunderstood her master. But, ere long, Lady Ashley was seen flying towards him.

"What have you done with my child?" she panted, as she approached; and her eyes glared as he had never seen them glare but once, and that was several years before, in Ashley shrubbery, when she was Miss Carmagic.

Mr. Ashley rose, and raised his hat. He thought her strong emotion was but the effect of her exertion in vanning.

"I have sent the servant to the house to inquire of Sir Harry where he left him, Lady Ashley. It was not with me."

"It is false ! False as you are, Arthur Ashley. Sir Harry did leave him with you. Give me my child! Where have you hidden him? Have you put him into the water!

Before Mr. Ashley, surprised and confounded, could find words for reply, Sir Harry neared them. He was not so swift of foot as his wife. Patience also was advancing behind. "Arthur," called out Sir Harry, "where's Carnagie?"

"I have not seen him since you took him away. You remember you refused to leave him with me."

"I know I did. But he cried to come back, and I sent him. I watched him come."

"I assure you that he did not come," replied Mr. Ashley. I have not stirred from this spot. Do you say you watched im come here?"

"I watched him halfway across the field. He was making fast for you, straight as an arrow."

Arthur looked terribly confounded. And the more so because Lady Ashley still glared steadfastly upon him, with her white teeth set, and her accusing expression.

The servant, Patience, had turned aside, but was again seen advancing now. Her face was pale as with affright, and she laboured for utterance. "Oh, sir! oh, my lady!" was her confused exclamation, before she had well reached 'them," Grimes's boy has just met me, and he says they think there's a child drowned, for a hat is floating on the water."

"Where? A hat-where?" demanded Mr. Ashley.

" Round there. Beyond the bend."

He rushed away, the rest following him. No one paid attention to little Ryle, so the servant picked him up in her arms, and ran after them.

Lower down the stream, much lower, they came upon a group of idlers who had collected there, labourers and others. One of them held on a stick a child's straw hat dripping with water, which he had just fished ashore. It was Carnagie Ashley's. There was nobody to be seen, they said, but it might be lower down—have gone down with the current.

"Is anything the matter?" demanded the voice of Surgeon Gay, hastening up to the people, whom he had discerned as he came along the by-path from the village.

"Matter enough," a countryman replied. "Sir Harry's heir was in the water. At least his hat was, and the boy was missing."

"I accuse him of the murder," impetuously broke forth Lady Ashley, pointing her finger at Arthur. "The child was left under his charge, and he pretends to know nothing of him. He put him into the water."

1 "Be quiet, be quiet, I entreat you," cried Sir Harry, in agitation. "You cannot know what you are saying."

"The child stood between him and the inheritance," persisted Lady Ashley, who was excited almost to madness, far beyond all control. "Only yesterday we caught him plotting with one who assured him his son should succeed to Ashley, and not Sir Harry's. It is he who has made away with the child."

Every vestige of colour—the bright colour of the Ashleys had forsaken Mr. Ashley's cheeks, and the words, as he spoke, literally trembled from his agitated lips. "Me friends," he said, standing bareheaded, "you have, most a you, known me from childhood, and can judge whether am capable of committing so revolting a crime. Here he suddenly snatched at the hand of Ryle, and pulled his forward—"stands my own child: had the lives of the children been in my power, had I been compelled to sacrific one of them, I swear to you that it should have been the one, rather than the other. Sir Harry," he added, claspin in his agitation the baronet's arm, "I never saw or hear your child from the moment you walked away with him had I witnessed him in any danger, I would have save his life at the expense of my own. Surely you believ me?"

"Yes, yes," ground Sir Harry, wringing his nephew hand. "I see how it is. I should have watched him into your charge. Something must have attracted the boy aside It is my carelessness which has caused this."

"Oh, take heart, all of you! take heart, my hady!" said cheerful Surgeon Gay, who was sure to look on the best side of things: "you don't know yet that anything is really amiss with the boy. He may have strolled away. The hat's nothing," he continued, in answer to a man who raised it as if to confute his argument. "Last autuum, whon my fourth boy's cap was discovered in Pront's Pond, an brought home, wet, to his mother, she wouldn't hear word but that he was drowned, went into a succession of fits, and wanted me to put the shutters up. Two hour afterwards, the young Turk walked himself home, with hi pinafore full of blackberries. He wou't forget the tanning I gave him, though, if he lives to be a hundred."

The miller, James Heath, whose cottage was on the opposite shore, some way removed from it, was now seen crossing the foot-bridge. His face was whiter than usual, which it had little need to be, for it was always under a layer of flour. He stepped into the midst of the group, taking off his hat when he saw the Ashleys.

"Whose child is it?" he inquired. "My wife witnessed the accident from her bedroom window."

Lady Ashley grasped his arm, the white dust from the man's clothes soiling her rich gauze dress. "Speak, speak 1" was echoed around, and "Speak 1" reiterated the passionate lady; "tell me who threw him in."

"The little fellow was coming across the plain, my wife said, running hard, and throwing his hat up, as if trying to catch something. She thinks it might be one of the summer cockchafers, or maybe a butterfly. She could not see him distinctly so far off, but she believed it was one of the young ones from the parsonage. He was spinning along with all his might, his hat raised for another throw, and he came, without knowing it, on to the edge of the water, and tumbled right in, head over heels."

"Why did she not save him—why did she not give the alarm?" uttored Mr. Ashley.

"Because she could not, sir, unfortunately, as Mr. Gay can tell you; she can't stir a peg."

Mr. Gay nodded. "She has not recovered the use of her limbs since her attack," he said, "and as they place her on a chair, so she must remain. I am on my way to see her now."

"She called and shouted," proceeded the miller, "till she was a'most hearse, she says. But I was in my mill, and when that's a-going there's no chance of my hearing anything else, and the girl was gone to the village. So the house-door was shut, and, more than that, all the windows were. Whose child was it?"

"It was the young heir,"

The miller started, and looked at his landlord. "Oh, Sir Harry! I did not know..."

What he would have said was interrupted by L. Ashley. "Who pushed him in?" she uttered ...", threw him into the stream? Was it not he, Art Ashley?"

"Ho?" repeated the miller, his countenance express every degree of astonishment. "Lord love ye, my lad Mr. Arthur ain't one to hurt a hair of a child's head. "I poor little innocent was a-ranning about, in his sport, a fell in of his own accord. There was not a soul near him more's the pity but what there had been."

The body was not found till late at night, by torchigh Sir Harry and Mr. Ashley were both amongst the crowd of the bank, and it was the latter who received the unluck child from the men. A momentary weakness overcame him. When it had passed, he turned to his nucle. "He was my little godson," he whispered. "I would give all I am worth to recall him to life. I would have given more than I am worth to save him."

But not so said the crowd. "It is a mercy for him that he is taken in his infancy," they murmured to each other, "before the responsibility of right and wrong can lie upon him. With his crafty disposition and violent passions, there's no telling what evil he might have done, had he lived; or what might not have been his end."

"And not less a mercy for the place," mattered Surgeon Gay to himself. "It would have fured but budly, had he lived to become Sir Carnagio Ashley."

CHAPTER VI.

ST. OUEST.

The scenery around St. Onest was charming, but the town was odious. Town indeed I it was nothing but a hamlet, with two hundred houses in it, and a gutter, a yard wide, running through the middle of its principal street, after the approved custom of French towns. St. Onest lay in a remote valley, not far from the Eastern Pyrenees, which could be seen in the distance on a clear day, and to gain it from the high-road you had to encounter a remarkably steep descent and a sharp turn, safe enough for the surefooted mules of the villages, but less agreeable for the post-horses of travellers.

The hot day was over, one Thursdey in August, and the inhabitants of St. Ouest sat outside their doors on either side the gutter, cooling themselves in the air and the scent before going to bed. The place could boast of a large and good inn, for the road above St. Ouest was one of traffic, and travellers were apt to turn off it to the village when they wanted rest, or to change their post-horses. The Hôtel du Lion d'Or stood at the entrance of the town, its host being the postmaster, as the sign over his large doors intimated: "Auguste Dusonmerard, Maître de Poste aux Chevaux." Where Monsieur Auguste hid himself in the day-time nobody could tell; perhaps the cafés could; but the active, bustling conductor of the business was madame his wife. She saw to the housekeeping, she saw to cooking, she saw to the servants, she saw to the guests, saw to the marketing, she saw to the post-horses, and a saw to everything. What would these lazy, incapa Frenchmen do without their netive, elever wives?

Madame Dusonmerard, like the rest of St. Onest, sat the bench in front of her hotel. She was a stim, acti woman, with a clear complexion and quick dark eye Three of her maids sat on the same bench, but at its low end, while the gargon Zan (as they had corrupted his may Jean) rested himself in the porte cochère, half sitting on the low post which leaned against its corner. Meanwhile the night drew on and the cafés began to empty themselved Monsieur Dusonmerard might then have been seen saunteing towards home in his shirt-sleeves, and wiping his brey with one of the wristbands, for it was always hot in the café especially the Café du Soleil, which he patronized.

"Madame! madame!" suddenly screamed forth one the maids on the bench, "we are going to have travelle to-night. I hear the sound."

Bah 1" responded madame. "Who is likely to come a late as this? Your cars are too line, Celestine."

Collectine had a remarkably quick car, and sometimes presumed upon it, but she knew she was right now. The have turned off the read, and are coming down." she say "Two carriages there must be, for I hear a double set horses—three or four to each carriage."

Madame bent her car. "It is so," she exclaims "Look alive, my girls. Zan, get out of the porte cochère.

"Ste. Marie !" was Mr. Zan's reply, as he stolidly kep his place on the post; "what's the matter with them, the they are advancing at such a mad rate?"

Madame rose, and stood in consternation: the frightens, post, ran a few steps to the left, turned up by the side of the house, and gained the vineyard, whence he had a view of the descent and was out of harm's way. Never had they yet heard horses come down that hill at a more fearful pace.

Zan folded his arms and did nothing: an Englishman would have rushed forward, at the risk of danger to himself, in the hope of averting it for the travellers. Not so Zan: he only looked on, and waited for consequences. Two carriages were descending the hill, the postilions of the first, who had lost all command of their horses, were shouting and sereaming as only Frenchmen can scream. On, on tore the cattle: safely till they came to the sharp turning near to the Lion d'Or; but then——horses, carriage, and men were down, a frightful, frightened mass.

Zan condescended to advance then: mine host was soon with him, and half St. Ouest at mine host's heels. The postilions were drawn out first: one of them, though bruised and battered, shook himself and staggered back to afford what help be could: the other was dead. The horses were next secured from doing further mischief, and then the carriage could be got at. It contained a gentleman and lady. The former, who was getting in years, had his head and face covered with blood, cut by the glass. They brought him out, M. Auguste and another supporting him. He did not seem much injured, but confused and partially stunned.

"For the love of Heaven!" he said, "get a doctor. A doctor. Does anybody understand me? Does anybody speak English?"

"Oui, oni, monsieur," answered the landlady, "I do comprend Lapake the Angleesh. Zan, vite I cherchez Monsieur le Médeein. You no be afraid, monsieur; you no too much blessé. Doctour soon ici." Madame had entertained many English travellers in her time, and had picked up her stock of Provide from them

"Oh, I am all right," he answered, almost contemptnois!
"It is the lady."

They were removing her from the carriage, totally is sensible. A lady under thirty, dark in complexion, he very handsome. The ready wit of the landlady suggests a mattress, and one was brought in no time. They laid he on it, and carried her to the hotel.

"Are we to stop here for ever?" screamed a female voice in native French, from the other carriage, which and because the brought to a standstill, and the horses' heads turned against the bank, while the posthoys had gone on to the scene of accident. "Just come and open this door, some of you gaping mob: I can't do it from the inside. Do you think we don't want to reach miladi and see what damage is done?"

The door was speedily opened, and, scolding and talking the damsel descended from it. She was a French hady maid. Behind her came also a coloured woman, holding it her arms a rosy sleeping child of four years, fair as alabaster, with long flaxen curls.

"Est-elle blessée? est-elle ture?" demanded Mudemoiselle Barbarie, as she approached her muster, too much flarried to be coremonious.

"I don't know what she is," he replied: and, it may be observed that, though he had never brought his tonguet uttor half a word in French, he could partially make it on when spoken by others. "Ask if the doctor will be long Barbarie; if he lives far off,"

The doctor lived in the centre of the village, next door to the chemist's shop, and right over the savonry gutter, which was there at its widest. A long and eager queue (madang so phrased it) had flown to fetch him, and in a few minutes he was in the hady's chamber.

Little intermission had be in his visits there for the next thirty hours; indeed, he searcely left it. The accident had not seriously injured her, unless—here was the danger—after-consequences should ensue. The whole house, doctor included, addressed the travellers as miler and miladi. They were of the English nation, and rich, and that was quite sufficient.

"Milor" on the Friday was tolerably well, with the exception of the diachylon plaster on his head and face. saw no reason why he should not have some dinner, so he ordered it, and walked about the sitting-room (which contained his bed in one corner), considerably chafed and restive until it should be ready. He had never felt so "bored" in his life. Unable to show himself in the street. for he was conscious that with those plasters he looked very like a Guy Fawkes; not choosing to appear even in the "salle," with its everlasting enting-table, never unlaid, and the staring Zan; excluded from his wife's chamber, and confined to this narrow one of his own, with its sanded floor, he thought the day never would pass. He asked for some books: they brought him four, all French, and usoless to him; he asked for his sweet little daughter, Blanche, but she had been taken out for a walk : he had recourse to the window, but nothing was to be seen but a closed-up house opposite, and the lag-end of the gutter. "Purgatory" (a word he had just made out in the French books) "could not be worse than this I" ejaculated milor.

It struck four, and Célestine and the landlady came in to lay the cloth for his dinner. He could have embraced them both. At the same moment, a sound arose from the street, as of solemn chanting, and madame and Célestine sped to the window. Milor peeped also from behind the calico curtain.

"What's going on?" he asked.

It was a Roman Catholic funeral, winding along towards, the cemetery. A number of persons followed it, chiefly of the poorer class.

"Pauvre Etienne 1" cried the landlady, her ready tears falling. "To think that this time yesterday he was as well as we are."

"Why, you never mean to say that whoever is in that coffin was alive last night?" exclaimed the Englishman, catching the sense of her words.

"It is the custom with us to bury them the day after death," explained madame. "This is a hot climate, miler. And indeed, the same day, if they die early in the morning, and we can get the preparations ready."

"Sharp work. I should think some get interred alive. I suppose those little boys, walking nearest, are sons of the dead. What did he die of?"

The landlady attered an exclamation of astonishment, "But is it possible that milor does not know that it is the funeral of the poor postilion who drove him last night?"

He felt greatly shocked, almost to tremor, and not down on a chair. He had known the poor fellow was killed, but thus to see his body borne past to the grave brought the horror more palpably home to him.

"It is just as if it was to be Etienne Baux, and none but he!" exclaimed the landlady. "When I ordered post-horses out for that travelling-carriage yesterday morning, I ordered lame Jaco out with them; then I found that lame face was down with the fever, and had never come at all nat day to his work. So I called out that Louis the aresseux should go. With that, up comes poor Etienne and said he would go, if I pleased, for that Louis the paresseux wanted to wait and drive the mail, to see his brother, who was dying in the next town.—That musty fever, milor, has played real work with us this year, all throughout the department,—So poor Etienne went with the horses, stopped there for the day, and was driving them back in your carriage at night. Ah me!"

"Does he leave many children?" was the grave inquiry.

"A whole troop of them. Five or six --- is it not, Colestine? And another on the road, more's the pity!"

The procession had wound itself out of sight, up the hill, and madame and Célestine whisked out of the room again. It was the former who brought in the soup.

What did miler think? The doctor had been in miladi's room since one o'clock, cating nothing, suppose she asked him down to take a plate of soup?

"Yes, of course," was the ready answer. "Not soup"—with a rueful glance at the watery contents of the tureen—"something better; meat and wine."

The doctor came; and swallowed down the contents of a soup-plate, standing. It was bonne, excellente, he said, better than meat, which he had no time for, and as to wine—no, no. He had need that day of a steady hand and cool head. All was going on well, he added, but it had been a critical accident for miladi. And ever since she came to her senses she had given way to such excitement; was so anxious that the child should be a boy, that it should be born alive.

"We have no heir," explained the Englishman, through the landlady. "A girl cannot inherit." The surgeon shrugged his shoulders. Living under the equalized codes of France, our laws of heirship were about as easy for himto understand as those of the ancient Medes and Persians.

By the help of some good claret, of which he was compelled to drink sparingly lest his head should inflame, the forlorn guest got through the rest of the day. On the following one he determined to go ont, plasters or no plasters. Another day of onnui, like the preceding one, mould "do him ma". All was enflected well in his wife's chamber, and when the black nurse dressed little Blanche that morning, she told her she had a new brother. dint of pulling his hat low on his brow, and tying a black silk handkerchief up the sides of his face, he partially hid the damages, and sallied out.

His first steps were naturally directed to the score of the accident, and here, as he strolled slowly up the hill, after contemplating it, he found that the upset had shaken him more than he thought, for he felt fatigued and dizzy, and down he sat on the roadside bank. Closing his eyes, he only opened then at the sound of footsteps.

A traveller was descending the hill, a sunburnt man about his own age, who held a stout stick in one hand and his straw hat in the other, whilst a small value was awang round his shoulders. He was about to pass the invalid, when the latter rose up in haste.

"Surely," he exclaimed, "it must be Major Hayne ! is you, Philip."

"And who the douce-why, bless my heart and mind, if I don't believe it is Henry Ashley! Is it you, or your

"It was pretty near being my spirit, the day before yesterday," was Sir Henry Ashley's reply, as he grasped the traveller's hand. "How singular that we should meet

"Singular I I do not believe it is real. I was dreaming you last night, and have been thinking of you to-day, alf resolving that my next move should be to England, to pay you a visit at Ashley. And here, as I descend this hill, undreds of miles away from it, and wonder what the old loggar I see on its side has been up to with his face and and, he turns out to be Hal Ashley ! What have you heen

"If I were not a family man, I should make a vow never to travel again but as you do—on foot," replied Sir Henry. "As we were coming down this hill, on Thursday evening, my carriage overturned—there, a little below; and the final results are still uncertain."

"An awkward bit of road," remarked the Major, scauning it with his keen eye.

"Awkward 1 I never saw such a nasty hill. I wish I had those whose place it is to alter it under my magisterial thumb at Ashley. It is a disgrace to any civilized land; but they are not civilized in this wretched France. One of the postboys was killed, the other injured, you see the figure I cut, and my wife has been driven into premature illness."

How long have you been abroad?" inquired Major Hayne, as he sat down on the bank. "I was not aware you had left England."

"Twelve months. We went to Paris first, and since then have been about, I can hardly tell you where. Right royally glad was I to turn towards Old England again. We intended being back there for Lady Ashley's confinement."

"You don't like the Continent?"

"I hate and despise it. I should never have consented to come, but that Lady Ashley's state required change. We lost our eldest child in a most unfortunate manner—the little fellow whose christening we were celebrating the day you came to Ashley, some years ago. It was a lamentable accident, and arose partly through my carelessness. Lady Ashley went nearly out of her mind: indeed, I do think that for a time she was positively insane, and the medical men ordered a complete change of scene. So we came abroad."

"Has it been of service to her?"

"Oh yes; she had grown quite well. And now this appalling accident! And for it to have occurred in this wretched village, which, so far as I can see, has neither comforts nor conveniences! Nothing to be bought for money. I believe they have been ablified to dress the infant in Blanche's things. And, to make it more inconvenient altogether, I caught my man acreant out, a fortnight ago, in such barefaced pilfering, that I discharged him, and determined not to get another, as we were returning home, Those foreign servants are all rogues."

"Who is Blanche?" demanded Major Hayne.

"My little girl. Suppose we go and see her," he added rising. "The loveliest child, Philip!"

"Got the Ashley curls ?"

"Ay. The poor hoy was like his mother, but Blanche is an Ashley all over,"

Major Hayne gave Sir Harry his arm, and they proceeded to the inn. The landbaly met them at the entrance.

Had milor been to register the infant at the marries?

Not be, "Milor" knew nothing about the recistering or the mairie. What did she mean?

Then he must go to the mairie without delay. A child born in France was compelled to be registered at the matical within a few hours of its birth, and Mousieur le Commissaire had just looked in to say it must be adhered to in this instance, although the infant was a foreigner and a heretic: otherwise they should all be brought up before the court to answer for their negligence. Milor must go at once.

"How can I go amongst the people this object?" attered Sir Harry,

Oh, that was nothing, madame answered. Everybody knew of the accident, and would only sympathize with the patches of plaster. Her husband was waiting to accompany milor, in the capacity of witness, and had his best coat on,

So Sir Harry, growling, went with Major Hayne and the landlord to the mairie. The officiating Frenchman, whose face could not be seen for hair, sat, pen in hand, ready to inscribe the child. "Quel nom?" he demanded.

"He asks what name," interpreted Major Hayne, who had picked up a sort of language in his travels which did for French. "What is it to be?"

"Name 1" uttered the discomfited Sir Harry. "Lady Ashley likes to fix on the children's names herself, and she is too ill to be spoken to. It cannot be necessary to name it now."

"Quite indispensable, he says," cried Major Hayne, after a parley. "Impossible to register it without, he's saying. Just hark how he jabbers at us!"

"What absurdities the laws of France are 1" exclaimed Sir Harry, wrathfully. "Indispensable, indeed 1 and the infant but a few hours old 1. Why don't they insist on naming a child before it is born?"

"The name is not of much consequence," responded the Major. "Give him your own."

"No. Lady Ashley said, one day, she disliked mine."

-" Give him mine, then. Philip."

"That's as good as any other, in the uncertainty," mused Sir Harry. "Tell him 'Philip.' Stay—add 'Ryle.' 'Philip Ryle.'"

Another colloquy ensued, puzzling to both sides. Sir Harry flew into a rage at the Pronchman's stupidity in spelling English names, and at length Major Hayne wrote them down in large letters, and the man copied them into the register. "Philip Ryle, fils do Henri Ashley, rentior, et de Lauretta Carnagie."

CHAPTER VII.

"MILADI WILL BE KIND TO HIM?"

MISFORTUNES never come alone, so the old saying runs. St. Ouest was liable to be visited, towards the fall of the year, by a low fever, half aguish, half typhoid. Had our commissioners of health gone there, they might probably have assigned its cause to that smitary gutter, which, with a few more, equally sweet, ended in a pool of stagmant water and malaria. The inhabitants thought nothing of the gutters or the fever: they had been bred up in their midst. Now it is well known that a person going fresh into a locality where a disease reigns is particularly liable to be attacked by it, and this may have been the ease with Sir Harry Ashley. Certain it is, that, before he had been a week at St. Ouest, he was down with the fever.

It was a struggle between life and death. And when the positive danger from the disease was over there appeared to be quite as much danger from the state of weakness to which he was reduced. It may not have been the reader's fortune to witness, personally, the effects of this fever common to many a French town. It has been mine: and I can truly say that there is no weakness, no prostration, worse than that entailed by this disorder.

What Sir Harry would have done without Major Hayne, it is impossible to say. Probably have died. The Major was his constant and patient nurse, his cheering companion. He watched the moment for administering his strengthening medicines and nourishment, he was ever at hand with a cheerful word to rally his drooping spirits. Sir Harry feebly expressed his regret that the Major should be subjected to so wearisome a task, urging him to leave him to his fate, and to seek relief in continuing his travels. Wearisome ! the Major replied : he should never care, so far as he himself was concerned, to be jollier than he was He had been long without a reminder of old times in India, and this was one; he had brought many a chum, . there, through worse illness than this! All sorts of expedients the Major resorted to to amuse the invalid. was repeatedly called into requisition, for he thought that if anything could arouse Sir Harry from his dreamy state of weakness, it must be the sight of his children, Major condescended to turn muse, and would hold the infant, Blanche's now brother, on his knee, and exhibit lits swarthy face to Sir Harry. The fact was, Major Hayne began to fear that unless Sir Harry would make an effort of his own accord to rally, they should be obliged to leave him in the cemetery of St. Ouest. The Major was afraid of touching the baby at first, but he got used to it. was cariously small, and bore a striking resemblance to its mother in its very dark complexion, piercing black eyes, which already had her keen expression, and promises of jetblack hair. When it grew to be five or six weeks old, the Major would pretend to play at be-peep with it. Anything to excite a languid look or smile from the invalid.

The medical men—for in addition to the village doctor one had been called in from a distant town—at length pronounced that Sir Harry's best chance of recovery would be change of air. Sir Harry had thought so from the first, for the very place, he declared, was pestilential, and "the smells stifled him." Major Hayne eagerly seized on the notion, and undertook to consult with Lady Ashley.

That lady had not left her chamber, though the child was then two months old, and consequently had not seen her husband during his illness. "An unfeeling shame," muttered the Major to himself; "the woman is as capable of coming down a few stairs and across a corridor as I un; and if not, she might wrap herself up and be carried down, It's all Indian laziness."

The Major was not far wrong. However, he entered Lady Ashley's chamber and told her why it was necessary that they should depart. Would she go?

Lady Ashley quite laughed at him. She might be well enough to think of it by about Christmas, not before.

"In the half of that time, ma'am, in the quarter of that time, we should have to put your husband underground, if the stopped here."

"It is of no use talking, Major; it annoys me. I shall not think of stirring from here until I feel I am authoriently strong to bear the journey without fatigue."

The Major was sorely tempted to an explosion, but he coughed it down. A bright idea seized him. "As it may be essential to keep your husband alive, as well as your all, what do you say to our going forward at once?" he asked; "you can follow at your leisure."

"Thank you," resentfully attered Lady Ashley. "A generous proposition that, to leave me alone in this horrid place."

"You seem fond of it," retorted the Major. "Howover, Lady Ashley, as it is a matter of life and death to Sir Harry, and his going or staying cannot seriously affect you, I shall take upon myself to net, and remove him."

The Major was a resolute man. When once he decided that he ought to do a thing, he did it, in spite of obstucles. Perhaps Lady Ashley found this out, for she afterwards acquiesced, with an ill grace, in the necessity for her husband's departure. It was arranged that Blanche should also leave. Sir Heary was anxious to convey the child beyond reach of that horrible fever; not that it was generally deemed infectious, but a sojourner at St. Ouest was never safe, and he desired to leave as little care behind for his wife as possible. No sooner decided than done. Major Hayne made a bargain for a second-hand nondescript sort of carriage, containing two compartments. In the counsfront of this went Blanche and Mam'selle Barbarie; in the larger interieur one of the seats was removed and a muttress laid down for the invalid, while the Major sat on the other. And thus they progressed by easy stages, very easy ones indeed, towards Paris.

"Ciel I quel malheur I" uttered Madame Dusommerard, entering Lady Ashley's room one gloomy day in November. "Has miladi heard the news!"

" What news?" apathetically responded miladi.

That poor widow of Etienne Baux I She has never been strong since the child was born, and now she is gone. I sent Theresine down with a little bowl of soup, and now she has brought it back and says the woman died an hour ago. The stupid thing, that Theresine is I but she is a girl who never did have any head. As if she could not have given the broth to the poor children, instead of lugging it back here."

"Whoover will take care of the children?" exclaimed Lady Ashley, somewhat aroused. "There are several, are there not?"

"Who, indeed! It is a merciful thing, miladi, that there's a God to be a Father to the fatherless. Poor little ercainres! It is not that they will be quite at a taule for means, for milor's fiberality has prevented that, but who is to charge themselves with them and brine thera up?—Perlians Mademoiselle Banx, the represence, will; she is their only relation that I know of, and she is their tather's erter?

"My lady," interrupted Nama, patting her black head inside the room, "nursee say little piccarning not seem well if my lady go see ?"

There was no need of a second summons. Lody Ashley durted across the passage to the room occupied to her infant. The web-nurse had it in her arms, its eye were heavy and its face flushed.

"If it were older, I should say it was about its restly oried madame, who had followed:

"Send instantly for the doctor," interrupted Ledy Askiey, putting herself into a state of great excitement. "Let has be brought without an instant's lost of time."

Madaine went to give the necessary order. When he returned, Lady Ashley was pacing the room as it she were walking for a wager, the child clasped in her seems. "But miladi is troubling herself more than there's usen ton too," remonstrated the landledy.

"More than there's occasion for!" witerated hady A liby, "This child's life is of greater value than our or better use. If died together than he,"

"A child's life is precious, nobody would say to the court ery, but it cannot be put in comparison with that of a crown appearson—with miladi's own, let us say. A child is but a child."

"I tell you, upon this child's living depends more than you can form any idea of," reforted Lady Ashley, who was too much agitated to weigh her words, "He must live! he shall not die!"

The doctor was heard coming up the stairs, and madame opened the door in readiness. He looked at the child; he saw nothing particularly the matter with it.

"Is it attacked with the fever?" demanded Lady Ashley. The fever, bah! The fever had left the town a month ago. He had told miladi so himself.

"Doctor," she impressively whispered in the strongest French she could command, and the words trembled on her lips, "the child must live. Keep him well, keep him in life, and I will reward you as you have never yet been rewarded."

The doctor looked at Lady Ashley and turned away with a raise of the shoulders. "If the child should be attacked with illness, I will do for him what lies in my skill," he observed, "but for life—that is not in mortal hands, miladi."

The doctor prescribed some medicine and went home again. He was descanting to his wife, "Les drôles de caractères qu'ils sont, ces Anglais!" when Zan burst into his room, in his untidy slippers down at heel, without the ceremony of knocking. Monsieur le Médecin must fly up to the hotel upon wings. The infant had gone into a convulsion, and miladi its mother was stark frantic.

Little rest that day had the worried doctor between the "frantic" mother and the sick child. It relapsed from one convulsion into another, the last occurring about twelve o'clock at night. In that it died. It happened—it is wonderful to see and reflect how great emergencies are sure to be provided for!—that a Swiss Protestant minister halted for that evening at the hotel. The landlady suggested that he should baptize the infant: indeed, the whole arrondissement had been alive with the scandal of its having been delayed so long—"these careless heretics!"—and Lady Ashley, when convinced there was no hope of its life, consented. So poor fittle Philip Ryle was made a Christian to die.

70 ASHLEY,

Excited, unmanageable as Lady Ashley had been that whole day, with the child's death she relapsed into comparative calmness. But she would not be spoken to. The attendants suggested her retiring to rest; she waved them off, and paced restlessly from one room to another, mattering words between her closed teeth and gesticulating with her hands, as if she were debating some question with herself.

Morning came, and with it commenced the preparations for the child's funeral. It was to take place that evening Lady Ashley indignantly protested against the haste, and the authorities were requested to allow it to be delayed, They refused: they said there were no grounds for granting the request, and nobody had ever asked such a thing before The Protestant minister had offered to remain to bury it; and Monsieur le Curé, the local priest, with magnanimous generosity, allowed it to be laid just outside his cemetery; not inside, lest it might contaminate the ashes of the departed Roman Catholies. Another funeral also took place the same afternoon-that of the widow of the ill-fated Rtienne Baux, the postboy. The whole population of the place turned out to attend them through the rain: a few were attracted by sympathy to that of Madame Etienne, but the masses flocked to the other, curious to witness the scremonies of the heretics over the burial of their dead.

Late in the evening, Madame Dusonmerard was in her kitchen, scolding her maids, for the seven o'clock supper was not ready. It had been a noted day, what with the funeral from the house and the other one, and the girls had seized upon the opportunity for enjoying a gossip; consequently their work suffered, and madame was holding forth in rather shrill tones. She was in the midst of a sentence, specially hurled at Mam'selle Thérésine, when upon turning her head, who should she see, standing in the middle of the kitchen, but Lady Ashley, dressed to go out.

Madame's tongue and words dropped to the softness of butter in summer. What could she have the pleasure of doing for miladi? To think that miladi should have condescended to come down there, amongst the casseroles!

"I want a guide," said Lady Ashley—"some one to go out with me. I wish to go and see those poor orphanchildren. Let one of the servants show me the way," she added.

"But miladi surely will never do such a thing to-night!" cried madame. "Everybody must appreciate miladi's benevolent thoughts, but she must consider her own comfort and health. It is pitch dark, and the rain pouring down still, as it has done all day. Miladi had better wait till morning."

Miladi chose to go then. So Célestine, in obedience to orders, threw on her ample olive-green cloth cloak and attended her.

"Is it far?" inquired Lady Ashley, walking under the large, bright scarlet umbrella, which Célestine held.

"About six or seven minutes' walk," responded the girl.
"We follow the gutter—would miladi please to take care of her long petticents?—then turn to the right, then to the left, and miladi is at it."

They reached the place, Gélestine piloting Lady Ashley up the stairs. The sister of Etienne Baux had entered, and taken possession of the room, the furniture, and the children. Four children were askep in the bed in the recess, two at the top of the bed, two at the foot, French fashion; another slept in the bed in the room, and the infant, now a month old, Marie Baux held in her arms, feeding it with some broth from her own supper. Two gossips were seated near, having dropped in to hear her company.

"It is Miladi Anglaise," was Collectine's introduction the astonished Demoiselle Baux. "She is come to see a poor little orphans, all through the dark and wet. Made wanted her to put it off till daylight, but nothing would abut that she must come to-night. Quelle dame charitab and her own infant only three hours buried!"

Lady Ashley east a glance, and but a glance, towards to sleeping children, while the gossips said "Bon soir," a withdrew in all humility. Her ladyship's attention we rivoted on the infant. "Is it healthy?" she impulse "Is it likely to live? It seems a very large child."

"Alas, yes I poor unfortunate I" replied Mademoise "It would have been a mercy, miladi, had it please the Holy Virgin to remove it with its mother, but strong a it is, it's sure to live and grow. It is the strongest up. heartiest of all the lot. But just reflect, miladi, what a task it is to fall on my hands !-!, who was beginning to think of getting married myself. I should not have cared much for the others, although there are five of them; th can shift for thems ives, and two or three will soon be ab to do something; but it is this infant that's the tie. Ho I am to go out to my work, the saints only know; and have my regular places. I can't leave it in bed, to be pitche out by the others; and I can't leave it on the floor, to be trampled on; and I can't dance myself home, three or four times a day, to feed it. Ah I it's a dreadful charge to fall on me, is this child I"

"I feel much compassion for the case," rejoined Lady Ashley, "and have come to see how I can help you. Suppose I were to take this infant and bring him up?"

The Demoiselle Baux could not understand. Miladi's French was somewhat obscure; but had such an offer been made in the most concise language, she would have thought she heard wrongly.

"I have no boy," repeated Lady Ashley: "my own dear little one is just buried in your cemetery. I will take this one, if you will, to supply its place."

Heavens I but Miladi Anglaise could never be serious I Such an offer to descend upon the poor miserable orphan Baux 1 Mademoiselle was bewildered with its greatness.

"Then you will give him to me?" said Lady Ashley.

"Oh, miladi! can it indeed be real? Mademoiselle Mestine, can it be that Miladi Anglaise is not playing the arce with me?" reiterated Marie Baux, in tears. "Miladi hall be prayed for every day for a year. Night and mornug I'll go into the church, my own self, to supplicate he Virgin for her in a prayer. Such goodness is unbelievable."

"Then I am to have him?" repeated Lady Ashley, growing impatient.

"Oh, whenever miladi pleases. And we will all fall on our knees in thanksgiving. It is nothing short of a miracle that has fallen on the infant."

The amazed Célestine crossed herself. She had stood, till now, with her mouth open. "Quelle bonte 1" she nurmured, "l'ange de charité qu'elle est !"

"I will take him now," said Lady Ashley.

"Now! late at night! in the merciless rain!" repeated Marie Baux.

"He will come to no barm. Célestine shall put him under her cloak. Neither cold nor rain can touch him there."

The infant, during the discussion, had fallen asleep. Mademoiselle Baux wrapped a shawl round him and handed him to Celestine. She stooped to kiss his cheek before the girl hid him in the ample folds of her olive cleak. "Miladi will be kind to him?" she whispered, looking with a supplicating expression at Lady Ashley.

"Kind to him!" repeated Lady Ashley. "The elshall be brought up as my own child. I promise it toy in the hearing of Heaven. What more would you have "Oh, miladi is all goodness! we should be intideled doubt her," answered the Demoiselle Banx. "And fort poor bits of caps and things he has, I will bring them miladi at the hotel—"

"No!" imperiously interrupted Lady Ashley. "On them to any child who has need of them: and you can conto-morrow morning and fetch away these he has on."

Lady Ashley and Célestino, the former condescending a carry the ponderous scarlet umbrella, had left the house us plunged into the mud outside it, when Mademoiselle Ban came after thom in a flurry.

Miladi had forgotten to ask the child's name. It we represent the second of the secon Considerably astonished was the Hotel, and all in a when the new importation arrived. The praises of Milad Anglaise were sounded from one end of it to the other. Such an instance of benevolence had never before been heard of. The nurse spoke up loudest of any, and seize the little child with signs of rapture. She spoke feelingh ever since the other infant's death she had been crying he eyes out at the prospect of losing so good a place, and not she should retain it.

But another surprise was to fall upon the hotel: perhaps not so agreeable a one. Lady Ashley, that came night summoned the landlady, and gave orders for their departure the following day. The place was now too melancholy for her to remain in, she said; madame might readily believe that—and her husband, Sir Henry, spoke anxiously in his letters for her return. He was already at their own home,

Madame replied that she knew well St. Onest must h triste, and though sorry to lose miladi, she could not of course urge her remaining. But she hoped they might see miladi again some time: perhaps next summer.

Lady Ashley could not say. It was very far from England. Madame might present the bill in the morning, and see to the post-horses. She should start in the middle of the day.

Nana, the West Indian servant, stood waiting to undress her lady that night, and it seemed she was to wait in vain. Certainly, Lady Ashley could bear an incredible amount of fatigue. The whole of the previous night she had paced the rooms in excitement, and this one, when it might be thought she would have been glad of rest and sleep, she was pacing thom still. Nana was tired, if her mistress was not: it was close upon midnight; and as the monotonous footsteps of Lady Ashley sounded on her car from the adjacent rooms sleep stole over her.

How long she slept she did not know, but her arm was suddenly and rudely shaken. She started up to see her mistress bending over her.

"Nana I" uttered Lady Ashley, with that resolute look on her dark face, and those pale compressed lips which the good, faithful woman disliked to see-" Nana, do you want to be flogged?"

"Hal mercy, my lady! Nana only shut her eyes for she think one little minute, and sleep come, come, without her knowing it."

"Tush! sleep away if you like, when you are not wanted; It is many years since you were what do I care? flogged----"

"Oh, many, many," interrupted the woman, beginning to

"My lady, what poor Nana do ?" tromble.

"Will you hear me, woman? I speak not of those old, light floggings in the West Indies and in Madras, but I ask adame his wife, the three maids, and Zan all stood in the reet to salute her, on the right and left of the porte cochère, alf the town had likewise congregated there to watch the sparture, the Demoiselle Baux and the orphan children rming part of them, while murmurings of prayer for filadi Auglaise the angel caught the car. Lady Ashley ave a cold bow on either side, and the carriage moved up he hill. As it toiled past the cemetery the lady cast a assionate, regretful glance towards a spot of earth near it, and when it was no longer visible she flung herself back in her seat, and her eyes fell upon the infant opposite to her. If we may believe all tales, that little child is not the only me who has been palmed off for a real heir.

CHAPTER VIII.

"ASHLEY FOR EVER!"

"ASHLEY for ever!" "Storm for ever!" Now Searler and-purple! Now Yellow! Who wins? Who loses Ranners floating, streamers flying, drums heating, trumpet blowing! Oh, the confusion, the excitement, the noise and worry of a contested election!

The green balcony in front of the Ashley Arms was crowded with gentlemen. The resettes of searlet and purple ribbons displayed by some of them were sufficient  $\kappa$ denote that they belonged to the Ashley party. Standing bare-headed in its centre, and leaning over the rail, as if about to address the mob, was the candidate in the Ashley interest. He was a tall, pleasant-looking man, somewhere about thirty, with light curling hair and a keen grey eye, It was Arthur Ashley, but his face was thinner than it used to be and his frame less robust. The county returned two The one, Colonel Paget, had been its representative many years, and was always sure of his return, and Sir Henry Ashley had now brought his nephew forward as the Very little canvassing had taken place: it was thought unnecessary, for a contest was not contemplated: when, a few days before that fixed for the election, a third man was announced. Who was it? No one could tell at first: but to the astonishment of the public and indignation of Sir Harry, it turned out to be Richard Storm, an attorney i extensive practice at Stopton, a neighbouring town. then began all the bustle, the ill-feeling of a contested lection. Mr. Storm was a popular man in his vocation, of eady speech and vulgar wit, but that took with the multiude: and he was certainly a bold man, for he had appeared a the village of Ashley, to court the Ashley votes, which ny one else might have supposed to be as safe as Sir Henry's Sir Harry consequently was in a towering passion, and wrote an exaggerated account of the proceedings to his vife, who was then sojourning in London on her return From Paris, fully expecting her to share in his indignation. \* A wide yellow banner, "Storm and the People for ever !" yas streaming from the beer-shop, opposite the only inn in she place, which was the Ashley Arms, haughtily inaccesable to anything yellow. This beer-shop had a flat roof, ascendable by a ladder and a trap-door. It was not an inconvenient standing spot, and, for want of a better, the yellows made the roof their head-quarters, where Mr. Storm hurangued the Ashlevites. At the present moment the roof was deserted, for the yellow band and the banners and the committee, and what recruits they had been able to ionlist, were on a parading tour through the village. When they came in front of the Ashley Arms, Mr. Ashley had begun his speech; hisses, groans, and drums instantly struck sup, to drown it, but Mr. Storm waved his hand and scommanded silence.

"My friends and followers," he said, "let us not forget courtesy. Our rival in the Scarlet-and-purple interest is speaking. Well, let him speak; why should we interrupt him? Keep silence. Who's afraid?"

Arthur Ashley, with a half-smile, inclined his head to Mr. Storm, and continued his address:

"I need not remind you that I am one of yourselves. I have grown up amongst you, and your interests are identical with mine. If there is one spot on this earth that is deto me, it is Ashley: if there is one place I would, above; others, see prosperous and happy, it is Ashley: if there is body of men I would serve at the sacrifice of time, healt and spirits, it is you, my friends, who have been born as bred at Ashley. I need not say that I will support the measures calculated to conduce to your prosperity, or that will strenuously oppose all such as would tell unfavourals upon you and upon your soil, because it would be impossible for me to do otherwise, for I repeat that I am one of your selves, and in promoting your honour and wetture, I promote that of my own family. You have ever found  $S_{ij}$ Henry Ashley a liberal landlord; you found Sir Arthus such : you--- "

At this moment a carriage-and-four came thundering up the hill-for the village of Ashley was not built on level ground—the postboys wearing yellow rosettes as large as their hats. It scared the crowd, whether searlets or yellows, right and left, and drew sharply up, underneath the balcons.

"Who in the name of wonder is this?" exclaimed Sir Harry Ashley, as he stood at his nephew's elbow. " A wellappointed carriage, gentlemen," he whispered. "Where can our friend of the law have picked up so influential;

"Why-egad, Sir Harry I it is your own carriage !" responded Squire Prout. "What the dickens does it mean ? "

"My carriage 1" loftily uttered the offended baronet. "I think you mistake, squire."

"It bears your arms, at any rate."

Sir Harry Ashley put on his glasses. To his amazement, to his horror, almost to his dread, the carriage did hear his arms. But this compound of feelings was as nothing to the dismay which overpowered him, when Lady Ashley, his rife, put her hand out of the carriage window, and her lead after it, and swung about a yellow rosette, larger than my there.

"My dear," he roared out in his sonorous voice, though berhaps, had he betrayed his genuine feelings, he would avo addressed her by a less endearing title—"My dear, ou are labouring under a confounded misapprehension. Dur colours are searlet and purple. Postboys, throw those ellow drabs to the ground."

"Postboys," retorted Lady Ashley, "keep the bows where hey are." Though exceedingly dark, as one born in a varmer clime, she was a very handsome woman, nearly hirty years younger than Sir Harry, and she looked forth in the crowd with a determined countenance and daring lip. "People," she began—no fear that she, in her haughty exclusiveness, would ever address inferiors as "friends"—I people, I am the wife of your chief, and I forbid you to record your votes for him."

She pointed, as she spoke, to Arthur Ashley. Sir Harry tood speechless with consternation.

""You know," she went on, "that Sir Harry had a son born to him, the heir to Ashley. You know that son was drowned. You were told it was an accident; that the child fell into the stream; but I, his mother, tell you it was no accident; that wicked man pushed him in, for he stood between him and Ashley. Will you permit such a man to be your representative?"

A conflicting sound rose from the astonished crowd; murmurs, hisses, and grouns. Some intended for the lady speaker, some for Mr. Ashley.

"But his orime has not succeeded—he has been foiled once more," continued Lady Ashley, her dark face assuming an expression of inalignant triumph. "He put one hair out of the way but another as you have heard way born to Sir Harry. Look at him." She seized, us spoke, an infant of a few months old, perhaps eight or to who sat by her side on the knees of his coloured nurse, a held him up to the window, where but little of his facould be seen for; the mass of yellow ribbons in his e border. "Vote for the yellow, people! Yellow for ever

"It is as big a crammer as ever was imagined, go friends," screamed out little Surgeon Gay, stattering his excitement, as he looked down from a corner of the balcony, "and if it were not out of respect to Sir Harry wife, I'd tell it you in stronger language. The child of fall in; he fell in of his own accord; and I'll be upon a coath to it, and so will Miller Heath's wife, who saw it don Her ladyship's gone a little here, with the sorrow," tapping his forchead, "when she says that. Mr. Ashley had a more to do with it than you or I had. Ashley for ever Long live Arthur Ashley!"

But with a wave of the hand, and a smile that expresse confidence in the crowd, I ady Ashley had signed to the postboys, and the carriage had resumed its way to Ashley.

Mr. Ashley, with a pale countenance, expressive more e sorrow than of anger, attempted to resume his speech, he public speaking had been put an end to for that day, ame he was hooted down. Some of the ment tore, huzzaing after Ludy Ashley's carriage. As to Sir Harry, all he prayed for was that the baleony would fall in and let him down beyond sight and shame.

Now it was a perfectly well-known fact, known beyond the possibility of doubt, that the death of the young heir to Ashley was purely accidental. The greater portion of those who made the crowd know it to be so, and that Mr. Ashley, as Surgeon Gay said, had no more to do with it than they had. Nevertheless, will it be believed that they were ready, now the cue had been given them by Lady

Ashley, to cast the crime in his teeth? Richard Storm was liberal with his secret money (or with somebody clse's), the beer-shop kept its taps flowing free of charge, day and hight, and the usual madness came over the voters.

When Ashley rose the next morning, the walls were povered with placards. "Who boned the child?" "Don't gote for Ashley, the many!" "What became of the heir?" Streams are handy!" and with numerous others of a similar tendency. Whilst a wretched daub had been hastily got up, of a drowned child being fished out of a stream, with a gentleman in black, supposed to represent A. A., prepring round a tree with fiendish triumph; and this was borne on a banner about the village. The unjust feeling grew to a pitch of excitement really marvellous, and when the following day came, which was the polling cno, Mr. Ashley lost his election.

Sir Henry Ashley (to go back a day or two) descended from the balcony and strode after his wife's carriage, far more excited than the crazy mob. It was reported after wards that, upon his reaching Ashley, a violent scene or disagreement took place between him and his wife. Certain it was, Sir Henry left within an hour for Stopton, and remained there until after the election, though he and his wife had not met for months. He had last seen her in October, and it was now June. Illness—the remains of a dangerous fever—had obliged him to return to England, leaving his wife and infant in a remote part of France. Shortly after, she had also journeyed on her return as fur as Paris, and there she had stopped until now, neglecting her husband's letters of surprise and remonstrance.

As Sir Henry left Lady Ashley's room, banging the door after him and striding along the corridor with angry step he passed the chamber used as a nursery, and, hearing thinfant's voice, turned into it. Little Blanche his daugh who had been his sole companion during her mot absence, was playing with the babe as it sat on the of the West Indian nurse. It was one of the lig c'.ildren in complexion ever seen. Blanche was fair, flaxen curls, but the infant was totally dissimilar to Its hair and eyebrows were nearly white, its face was a white, and its eyes were of a light, faint slade of blue, was a strong, big child, with wide, coarse features.

The baronet naturally proceeded to take notice of boy, not having seen it since it was two months old. drew Blanche away, bent down, and held out his h playfully.

"Nurse! Nana!" he suddenly broke forth, springing again more quickly than he had stooped down, "what h you been at with the child? You have changed its e and complexion."

The dark woman looked up, terror and perplexity writen her face, had Sir Henry been keen enough to read Her lips were strained back and her white teeth stood on

"Nana done nothing, massa. Piccaninny same lit piccaninny that massa leave."

"Same? of course it is the same, you stupid woman! suppose," added Sir Henry more slowly, "these you babies do change their looks." He stooped again, as would probably have taken the child, but at that momen he heard his wife's door open and her voice calling for he French maid, Elsie, whom she had brought from Paris.

"Changeable as the wind," he muttered to himself as he hastened downstairs and out of the house, on his way, as has been said, to Stopton. "Nothing would do, this spring but I must discharge Barbarie—who saited for Blanche very well, and did her duty by her—upon the pleat that she would have no French women in the house; I was inundated with letters and reproaches until I complied, and now he has brought home a French minx herself. Changeable s the wind."

Rumour 1 scandal 1 prejudice I how insinuating they are 1 a would seem almost impossible, but it is nevertheless true. hat a feeling against Mr. Ashley grew up in the county. ady Ashley must have had grounds for her accusation. easoned the gentlemen over their wine; and it was a fact hat only the unfortunate child had then stood between ethur Ashley and the inheritance. Mr. Ashley became ware of this prejudice; some old friends were cool to him a the magistrates' meeting, where he one day accompanied Ir Henry; some refused his invitations, and some passed im over when they sent out their own. A feeling of bitter esentment arose within him. He felt sure that Lady Ashley was still at work, secretly traducing him, and he emembered the threat she had once uttered to him in her calous rage; "I will wear those words in my heart, Arthur Ishley, until I am revenged." She was carrying out her breat with a vengeance; surely this was a heavy requital or his having slighted her as Miss Carnagie. He took his esolution; he would stop in such an unjust, prejudiced ielehbourhood no longer, and away he departed for London with his wife and children. But ill news travels fast, and to found upon his arrival there, that the calumny had preeded him.

CHAPTER IX.

MAJOR HAYNE'S PERPLEXITY.

The years sped on. Arthur Ashley did not return, at Linden, the small house bordering on Ashley Park, which had been his residence, was kept shut up. One snowy after noon in the week preceding Christmas, Edward Gay, surgeous and apothecary, as the words on his door-plate indicated was in his surgery making up pills, when the window was darkened and the doctor saw the brown head of a travelle above the wire blind, peering in through the flakes of gnow

"Open the door, Jos," he said merrily to his son, a ki of fifteen, just entering upon the mysteries of drugs and anatomy. "I think I know that face."

"It is only some old traveller, father, wanting to lear how pills are compounded. Just look at the snow on his hat."

"If you don't do as I bid you, young gentleman, you will have the pills making acquaintance with your head," was the retort, in a make-believe angry tone. "Open the door, sirrah."

"And how goes the world with my friend Ned?" inquired the traveller, entering the surgery, after shaking the snow from his shoes and his hat, and depositing a stout walking-stick in a corner. "Easily?"

"As easily as the cold and a forest of young mouths will let it," was the quaint reply of the surgeon, holding out his band and grasping that of Major Hayne. "You are not aged a day, Major. I thought you never meant to pay us a visit again. How long is it since you were here?"

" Five years."

To be sure. When you brought home Sir Harry after the French fever."

"Ah I a near touch for him, that was," cried the Major.
"I have been halfway round the world since then, besides sojourning two years in Canada. Is Sir Harry well?"

"No. I fear he is in a bad way. These pills are for him. Jos, put on your cap and take them up."

a That's one of your young forest, I presume," said the Major, noticing Jos.

"The worst of the lot for taking in potatoes and sundries. His grinders stand at nothing. Be of sir! Presto! Don't eat the pills as you go."

"What ails Sir Harry?" questioned Major Hayne, as:

Master Jos disappeared with the box of pills.

"A combination of complaints. Propsy the most prontinent."

The Major's face grew lengthy. "Seriously speaking, Gay, do you mean to say he is a confirmed invalid?"

"He's worse, Major. When I said be was going, I meant it. He is going fast."

"And my lady?" continued the Major, after a concerned pause.

a Don't ask me. Nothing ails her. She is no favourite of mine. I never did like her, but since her behaviour to Arthur Ashley, when she caused him to lose his election, I have despised and detested her. Her eldest child, Carnagie, was drowned, and she told the electioneering mob that he did it. Had I been Sir Harry, I should have put her into a madhouse that very day."

"Was there any mystery attached to the child's death?"

questioned Major Hayne. "Sir Harry once said he won tell me the particulars, but he never did, and I did I choose to ask."

"None whatever: except in Lady Ashley's maligna spirit. To keep Arthur Ashley out of the succession, s would sell her soul to that near friend of hers who wea horns and a tail; and when the accident happened which made Arthur Ashley again the he'r-presumptive, the evilher nature broke out in an accusation against him. coccurred six years ago last July. Carnagic was racing after a butterfly, and raced himself, head foremost, into the stream. Dame Heath saw the accident; and poor Arthu-Ashley sat fishing in the same stream, unconscious that ther was a young soul, within a stone's throw, drowning for wan of assistance. Down came my lady, when the nharm wa given, and accused Arthur, in her mad passion, of putting the boy into the water, hardly knowing, I believe, what she said. She was frantic with grief for the loss of the child, and with rage for the loss of the heir. After that, they went abroad."

"Where another heir was born," rejoined the Major, in that unfrequented spot, and so far from home. How many children are there now?"

"Only that one, besides the little girl. She has had no more."

"I must make acquaintance with the young gentleman when I go up to-day. I had him in my arms many a time the first few weeks of his life. He bears my name. Sir Harry was at a puzzle for one, and we thought Philip as good as any other. Something else, I think, was tacked on to it."

"Philip Ryle," said the surgeon. "But I did not finish anout Arthur and Lady Ashley. You brought Sir Henry home, you know, five years ago, after that attack of fever at St. Onest. We heard Lady Ashley was to follow very soon, and you left. But the months went on, and her ladyship never arrived; she was stopping in Paris. Arthur Ashley, with his wife and family, came down to Linden for Easter, for they had all passed that winter in London, he hard at work at his political duties. Soon after he came down, he was seized with inflammation of the lungs. I thought it was all over with him; it was what his father died of ; and when he did get better, I told him he must not go back to town and to worry, if he wanted to live. So he stayed at Linden. But in June, when the election came on. he was pretty well, and Sir Henry persuaded him to stand for the county, which he did. A third man came forward. a fellow from Stopton, Dick Storm, no more right to put up for a member than I have, and we all laughed at the notion of his standing against an Ashley. He was as sure of his return, was Arthur Ashley, as I am that I had reast mutton for my dinner this day. When, in the very nick of time, just as we were all assembled in this village street, candidates, county influence, farmers, and mob, my Lady Ashley's carriage appears in the midst of us, like Banquo's ghost ..... "

"She was at home, then?" interposed Major Hayne.

"No. She had come post-leaste from London. It was her first entry into Ashley since she quitted it, nearly two years before. She stopped her carriage, waved Dick Storm's colours in our faces, and forbid the tenants to vote for Arthur Ashley, because he had drowned the child, who stood between him and the inheritance."

"Absurd I" cried Major Hayne, his keen eye flashing "Nobody but a Bess of Bedlam would venture on such a thing."

"A regular Bess of Bedlam she was, that day, if eye I saw one," returned Mr. Gay. "She persisted in her accusation, turning the anger of the mob against Arthur, and the upshot was, he lost his election and Storm got in Quite a feeling was raised against Mr. Ashley throughout the neighbourhood, and he left in disgust."

"What did Sir Harry do?"

"Not what he ought. He should have spoken up fearlessly at the time and defended his nephew, instead of taking refuge in silence, which of course gave a colouring to my lady's words. The fact is, Sir Harry is more under petticoat government than he was in his first wife's time, and if she chose to accuse himself of having drowned the child, he dare not gainsay it to her face. I spoke up, and I was a very humble individual compared with some on the balcony, but my rile was raised, as the Yankees say, I should like to have ducked her in Pront's pond."

Major Hayne was a shrewd thinker, fond of tracing out cause and effect, "Lady Ashley must have had some private pique against Arthur I" he suddenly said.

Surgeon Gay nodded a succession of nods.

"Do you know what it is?" asked the Major.

"I only know what's said."

"Woll?"

"That when she was visiting here as Miss Carmagic, she was dying of love for Arthur Ashley," whispered the apothecary. "He led her on to it : perhaps he did not know what the passions of these half-casto West Indians are: and then she discovered that he was only atmusing himself at her expense, for his affections were given to Anna Rivers, now his wife."

Major Hayne drow a long, deep breath, which ended in a whistle. "Ho ho, Mr. Arthur! then you must expect something. 'Hell has no fury like a woman scorned.'

The poet spoke of an ordinary fury, and I reckon my lady has the elements of an extraordinary one."

"She just has. Major, not a word of this up yonder. Sir Harry has lived in blissful ignorance of the matter; indeed, few know it."

"Do you take me for a numskull, Ned?" retorted Major Hayne. "I hear and see, as I go through life, and say nothing. If I can put matters to rights in a quiet way, well and good, I do it; but I don't set people together by the ears. Good day; I'm going on to Ashley." He took his stick as he spoke and walked up the street at a sharp pace, humming a scrap of an old Scotch song—

"And when our day shall come, frind John, We will na meet it sair; But we'll think on a' the gude we've done, And could na mak' it mair."

Major Hayne entered Sir Harry's residence through the courtyard, not by the grand entrance; he was fond of announcing himself in the least ostentations manner. Before he had well closed the gate, however, a sharp salute, in the shape of a snowball, struck him on the check. With a few quick strides he seized the delinquent, a lad of five or six years old, who stood staring at what he had done.

"Now, young gentleman," cried the Major, wiping his face, "you and I must settle accounts. What is your name?"

"Master Ashley," answered the boy, stolidly. "I didn't go to do it."

The Major looked at him. An extremely light, colourless child, with a wide pag nose and paffy cheeks.

"Hay said there was only one boy," he muttered. "I must have misunderstood him; or this may be a consin: Arthur's boy, perhaps. Is Sir Harry Ashley your uncle, my boy?"

"Sir Harry Ashley is my papa, sir."

"Well, if you will take me in to him, I won't tell tales but don't you snowball a stranger again, or you may get Dunished."

The boy led the Major through the back offices, to the surprise of all the servants they met, upstairs into the library. Sir Harry, wheezing and coughing, was scated in an easy-chair by the large fire; whilst Lady Ashley, in her old, indolent fashion, was stretched back in another, nearly at full length. Nana stood bathing her temples with can de Cologne, for her ladyship had a headache,

Sir Harry was greatly broken, greatly altered. If any. thing could arouse him, it was the unexpected sight of his old and dear friend. He struggled to rise, which Lady Ashley did not attempt to do, and Major Hayne drew forward a chair and sat down between them. Presently the boy, who had fetched his sister, came and stood close to the

"This can never be Miss Blanche!" he exclaimed jokingly, as he took a hand of each. "This is a growingup young lady. Little Blanche used to kiss me; perhaps the young lady will be above it."

. Miss Blanche laughed, shook back her flaxen curls, and inclined her rosy cheek towards the Major.

"This one," playfully whirling round the boy, "and I became friends outside among the snow. But I want to see the other boy."

"There is no other," said Sir Harry. "We have only 10se two children."

Major Hayne looked puzzled. "Gay told me that the boy born at St. Ouest was living. He through whom I learnt nursing."

"That is he," said Sir Harry.

"This is not he," returned the Major in a positive tone.

"What is your name?" he hastily added to the boy. "The other name; not 'Master Ashley,' as you said just now."

"Philip," replied the child.

"Philip!"

"Philip Ashley, sir."

"And 'Ryle,'" interposed Sir Harry. "You remember, Major, it was you and I named him Philip Ryle."

"You are mystifying me," exclaimed the Major impatiently. "This is not the child I used to nurse at St. Ouest," he continued, turning sharply to Lady Ashley and Nama.

He gazed at both with his searching eyes. The coloured woman's face assumed an expression of terror, and she glanced at her mistress with an entreating, pleading look—as Major Hayne interpreted it.

"When you left the child he was only two months old," spoke Lady Ashley, with cold calmness. "How could you expect to remember him? Nothing changes so much as infants."

"But it is utterly impossible that any infant could change like this," persisted Major Hayne. "He was as dark as yourself, Lady Ashley; may, darker, with your own large, bright black eyes."

Lady Ashley grew a little, a very little, perturbed. "Ho was durk in the first few weeks of his life," she said, "but after he had a touch of the fever—the same fever which attacked Sir Harry—the skin peeled off his face and he became fair, as you see him."

e But look at this child's eyes," repeated the Major, who seemed lost in wondering unbelief; "they are small and light; it is not possible they ever could have been a brilliant black, as his were. You are joking with me."

"I have no more to say," haughtily responded Lady

Ashley. "There stands the boy, light now, though he may have been as dark as Nana. I have not used white pain to him, and am not answerable for the changing of infant complexions. Neither do I see what Major Hayne propose to himself by holding this argument, unless he has a wish to dispute everything I say."

The Major was silent, as of course he had no alternative but to be. But as he turned to speak with Sir Harry of other topics, he caught the strange look of apprehension and distress on the servant's face, shining even through the copper colour.

CHAPTER X.

THE DELAYED WILLS

SIR HARRY waited up until nine that night, expecting the usual visit of Mr. Gay; then he was helped to bed. But scarcely had he left the library, which then only contained the Major, when the little man entered it, full of apologies. He had been called out to an earnest case, and could not quit it until that moment.

"Ned," cried Major Hayne, who was thoughtfully looking into the fire, "did you ever hear of black children becoming white?"

"Might boil 'em down, perhaps," answered the surgeon.

"I never saw it done."

"You remember the child who was being christened the day I arrived here from India, ever so long ago, that little Carnagie? He had jet-black eyes and a swarthy complexion. Should you think such a child as that could ever turn fair, his skin white, and his eyes light?"

"Never. So long as oak and ash grow. Why?"

The Major did not answer. When he spoke again, it was on a different subject. "Doctor, I feel sure Sir Harry will not be here twelve months. He is worse than I expected to find him."

Twelve months I" cchood Surgeon Gny. "Before the hulf of that time has clapsed, we shall have a Sir Philip

Ashley,":

"A big boy, that, for his age," carelessly remarked t Major, "especially for one born under his peculiar circul stances. Who do you call him like?"

"Himself, and nobody else," was the reply of the surgeon "Carnagie was the image of his mother, and the girl is lik the Ashleys; but Philip resembles none of them. I to my lady, one day, that had she not been with the boyh France, one might have said he was changed at nurse Wasn't she angry with me! I had to beg her pardon,"

"Sir Harry will see you, sir," said a servant, entering and addressing Surgeon Gay.

When Mr. Gay returned to the room, which he did for moment before leaving, Major Hayne was in a deep reverle not having changed his position.

"Major," said the surgeon, touching him to call his attention, "you are Sir Harry's oldest friend, and can pre sume with him more than I can. Try and find out if his worldly affairs are settled : if not, urge it. And persuade him to have further advice: it would be more satisfactory afterwards. He will not listen to me."

Major Hayne aroused himself and looked at the surgeon. "Afterwards |" he cohoed. "Have you reason to fear that the end is very near?"

"There's a look in his face to-night that I don't like, If I am wanted, Major, I shall be at Mrs. Applieby's. The servants know it. Now for my trudge there in the snow."

"Flakes as big as a cheese-plate. Good night."

Major Hayne proceeded to Sir Harry's room. He was in bed, propped up by pillows, and panting for breath. "Sit here and talk with me, Philip," he said. "I have the most wretched nights. I often wish there was no night."

"Cannot you lie down more comfortably than that?"

"No; on account of my breath. Ah, Philip I a little ore painful breathing, the water a little higher, and the orld will have seen the last of Hal Ashley. In a few days shall be two-and-sixty: just the age at which my father ed."

"You must have better advice," said Major Hayne. Had I been here, you should have had it before."

"I had a physician at first, from Stopton, but he did to no good. Not as much as Gay does."

"Gay 1" slightingly rejoined the Major, bearing in mind hat the little man had just urged upon him; "he may be knowing apothecary for the village aches and pains, but ours is a serious case. By the way, Sir Harry, have you ado your will?"

" No."

"What! not provided for your children—not appointed heir guardians!" exclaimed the Major, in tones between stonishment and reproach. "How can you be so careless, ir Harry?"

"I know I ought to do it. I will one of these fine days, efore I get any worse. I am too careless. My sister lessy used to reproach me with its being my besetting sin."

"We have all a besetting sin," observed Major Hayne. Never a man or woman was sent into this world without ue. And we have striven but imperfectly to do our duty, f we have not found it out, and subdued it, long before rearrive at your age or mine."

"Philip, I shall leave you guardian of my children."

"I will not act," hastily interrupted Major Hayne.

Sir Harry stretched out his hand and clasped the Major's. You will act, Philip. Remember our close and long riendship."

The Major hesitated. "Who is to be associated with ac?"

"I thought of Arthur Ashley."

"Whow I" ejaculated the Major. "How will the please your wife, Hal? She holds him, I fancy, in litt favour,"

"He is upright and conscientions; and I wish to lem behind me a token of my confidence in him, and my regan But if what I hear of his health be true, Arthur may no be long after me."

"In which case his son must be next to yours in succession."

"His eldest son. Ryle,"

"And if that child of Arthur's should succeed in his minority, who would reside at Ashley? Your widow?"

"No, no; Ryle. Ryle and his personal guardian, who would, of course, be his mother. I trust in mercy it may never come to that: my wife would not loar to quit Ashley tamely. Why do you suppose so improbable an event? Philip is as strong and healthy as a younglion: there's no fear of his dying."

"How very extraordinary that a dark hoy, as he was should have become so fair I" remarked the Major. "Die you observe the change when Lady Ashley first brought him home, or has it come on by imperceptible degrees ; "

"Not by degrees. When she brought him home I was amazed to see the child so changed, for it struck me that when I loft him he was a swarthy little chap, something like poor Carnagie. But I thought my memory might play me false, for I was too ill to take much notice of him at St. Onest, as you know."

There was a silence. Major Hayne broke it, speaking abruptly.

"Harry, you must do justice to Arthur Ashley. You never should have countenanced your wife in her infamous accusation."

Sir Harry groaned. "I was bewildered at the time, Philip: I was, indeed. I have done latterly what I could o repair it, by speaking to my friends and neighbours months high estimation in which I hold Arthur."

" Is he well off?"

colle will be better off when I die. It is as much for anything else, that I ought to make a will."

"You would leave him money?"

Sir Harry indicated an answer in the affirmative, but his reath was growing alarmingly laboured. Major Hayne, magenetationed to him, imagined it was but a usual occurrence, the effect of his lying down.

"If I am to not, Sir Harry, I must not be fettered by fady Ashley. Shewer "

"" Oh, Philip ! raise me, raise me up !" almost screamed lir Harry. " ! shall sufforate."

The Major quickly passed his arm under the pillows. Do you feel worse?" he whispered.

"Send for Gay," was the gasping answer.

Later that night, when the snowstorm had ceased and the surgeon sat by Sir Harry's bedside, a servant in the Ashley livery might be seen, by the light of the watery mean, specifing along to Stopton in search of a physician as fast as the reads would allow his horse to go.

With the plarm of DEATH, for it was indeed appreaching, the pangs of remorse seized upon Sir Harry Ashley. Was there time to repair his dilatory carelessness? Barely. Upon how many death-beds does not the same remorse sitheavily! And, rely upon it, when the interests of this world have been so procrastionted, the same may be feared of those that pertain to the next.

When the physician came, he did not precisely say there was no hope, but he looked it. He remained until the morning and breakfasted with Major Hayne. Lady Ashley was not with them. Alarming illness in the house made no change in her labits, and she did not rise until later; she then proceeded to the door of her husband's room. It was fastened, and she knocked sharply. Hayne opened it and came out,

"Sir Harry is giving his lawyer directions for his will," he whispered.

"I wish to go in," she said.

"Pardon me, Lady Ashley. They will soon have finished." Sir Harry requested me to keep the room clear until then,"

She did not answer a word; she knew she had to deal with as determined a spirit as her own, but she sat down in the seat of one of the corridor windows and looked sullenly out on the snowy landscape. Presently the lawyer came out, bowed to Major Hayne, bowed lower to Lady Ashley, and passed down the staircase. They both went in then.

"I was bolted out," Lady Ash'ey resontfully bogun to her husband.

"My dear-I was telling Graystock about you and children-everything," panted Sir Harry. "I ough have done it before."

"What was there to do?" inquired Lady Ashley, positively was as ignorant of business matters as her I daughter, Blanche,

"Tell her, Philip," gasped Sir Harry. "I cannot ta

The Major "told" her to the best of his ability, but was lost in bewilderment just then, for he had heard a which had greatly astonished him-that there had been marriage settlement upon Lady Ashley. No relatives w near her to urge it, and Sir Harry, in his unpurdona carelessness, had put it off from time to time, until it l been put off altogether. During his courtship he 1 thought of little save rendering himself agreeable to M Carnagie.

"What do you mean about 'guardians?'" interrupted adv Ashley, as Major Hayne was speaking. "I am cometent to take care of my own children."

. "Oh, of course, as their mother, but there must be also mardians of their property and interests. It is necessary."

"Who are they to be?"

"Myself and Mr. Ashley."

Lady Ashley's eyes flashed fire. "Who appointed youad him ?"

. "Sir Harry. No one else has the power."

Lady Ashley turned to her husband. "Sir Harry, you aust undo this; you had no right to take such a step rithout consulting me. To Major Hayne I object, for I now that we shall but oppose each other. And as to arthur Ashley," she added, her fingers closing tightly rith resolution, "I swear that he shall never have authority wer my children."

· "Peace, peace, Lauretta," murmired poor Sir Harry. I have been shamefully unjust to Arthur in the last few ears of my life, playing by him the part of a coward. I annot die until I have remired it. Do not begrudge that I have bequeathed him. You and Blanche will have mough, and Philip will be far more wealthy, when his ninority shall be over, than I have ever been."

Lady Ashley grasped the bedelothes, her fingers, in their assion, nearly meeting. "You have left money to Arthur Ashley 1" she exclaimed. "You1"

"Not much. A noor requital for the accusation you cast t him and which I did not repel. Philip," he implored, is tone showing his helplessness, "let me have peace i I must be at peace in this my last day."

"I ask you," persisted Lady Ashley, "will you cancel that you have done? Will you countermand this will?"

and conscientious will. Ask Major Hayne; he will t

She turned to Major Hayne. "Is it made? irrevocal made?"

"It is being made. Mr. Graystock will bring it her by-and-by, to be signed."

Lady Ashley said no more. In the afternoon, when M Graystock came the second time, Sir Harry was gradual sinking. The lawyer read over the will. The Reverse Mr. Marsh, the incumbent of Ashley, and Squire Prout who had come to have a last word with his old friend, we called into the room to witness it. Lady Ashley glided in after them, but remained out of view, behind the curtain.

The will was spread out before Sir Henry, who was raised and supported by Major Hayne. He had taken the per in hand, when he suddenly looked up.

"Graystock, read that one part of it—relating to Arthu Ashley. It will do me good that my friend Prout should hear it in my presence."

Mr. Graystock read: "And whereas a cruel aspersion was east upon my dear nephew, Arthur Ashley, to the effect that he had caused the death of my son, I desire in this, my last will and testament, to affirm, of my own knowledge, his entire innocence, and to declare that I have never for one moment believed or countenanced the aspersion. And I hereby bequeath to the said Arthur Ashley."

"That will do," interrupted Sir Harry, motioning for the document to be again placed before him.

He signed the will, the witnesses testifying to his signature. "Thank God," he murmured, sinking back, "that the time to repair my carelessness has been accorded me!"

Mr. Graystock was folding up the paper, when Lady Ashley stole round the bed, and snatched it out of the Lawyer's hands. She toro it in two pieces, and thrusting them into the blazing fire, keeping them down with her hands, which must have received a scorching, she turned her dark, determined face towards Sir Harry.

"I told you," she uttered, "that Arthur Ashley should never have power over my children, neither shall be rob them of their money. I would rather tear him in pieces first, as I have torn your fine will."

Sir Harry raised up his hands and grouned alond, whilst the astonished speciators stood round the hed, and starod n consternation at Lady Ashley. Sir Harry cast an imdoring look at Mr. Graystock and at Major Hayne. "You oth know my wishes," he gasped: "carry them out,"

"The copy of this will is at the inn," quickly spoke up "Shall I fetch it, Sir Harry? Signed, it will be as legal as this."

" Fetch it, fetch it," was the eagerly assenting answer. " It is necessary for her sake, should anything happen to Philip." Off sprang Mr. Graystock. But before he crossed the threshold of the door a sound recalled him, and he looked back to see Sir Harry in the death-struggle. painful death, but a speedy one. In five minutes all was over.

"Your machinations have not prespeced," uttered Lady Ashley, as she gazed in triumph at Major Hayne. "My son is Sir Philip Ashley, and I am uncontrolled."

CHAPTER XL

BLANCHE.

Surely the house was going to rack and rain. Of servants, who had been in the family for years and year were turned away, and a new, ill-organized set collected in their places. Even the steward was dismissed. The sober, steady lawyer, Mr. Graystock, the confidential advise of the Ashleys, was also discarded, and Richard Storm, the rich but upstart attorney of Stopton, taken on in his stead. The tenants received notice of the raising of their rents the poor cottagers of dismissal, the labourers had their wages ground down, and the annuities to the old pensioners were abruptly stopped. Never, surely, had a few short months seen similar changes.

Sir Harry Ashley had died without a will. His little son, who had succeeded to the title and property, had no legally-appointed guardian, and his mother, the widow, assumed control of everything. She was of warm blood, warmer than pertains to these European climes, and some of her acts were so outrageous, so wilfully unjust, that people began to say she was either a very bad woman or an insane one. Sir Harry had died in December, and thus matters went on until May; Lady Ashley perpetrating acts of injustice daily, and the neighbourhood crying shame upon her. Perhaps none let her know the estimation in which she was held in so marked a manner as did Mr.

Gay, the village surgeon and apothecary. Lady Ashley was ailing, or funcied she was, and sent for him. The little man fairly returned for answer that he would not attend her. If Master Philip—he begged pardon, Sir Philip—or Miss Blanche required his services he would walk his legs off to attend them at any hour of the day or night, but neither her ladyship nor her new servants need summon him: if they wanted a doctor, they might send to Stopton.

Stopton was four miles off, and her hadyship would have been delighted to dose Surgeon Gay with an onuce or two of his own arsenic. Failing the opportunity, she sent him notice to quit his house, but the little doctor had it on a lease, and supped his fingers at her. Lady Ashley was very ignorant of business matters.

"How many years has the lease to run now?" demanded

Mrs. Chy, in a fright.

" Four."

"Then at the end of the four she will be safe to turn us out, and there's no other house in the village to suit us.t Whatever shall we do?"

"Don't look so scared, child," laughed the merry-hearted surgeon. "We'll manage to pitch our tent somewhere. Four years is four years. Somebody else may reign at Ashley by then."

Somebody else did.

On a summer day in May, when the hedges were fragrant with spring flowers, when the linden-trees were bursting out, and the oak-balls were growing large; when the cuckoo was crying its note, and the blue sky was serene and cloudless, the open barouche of Lady Ashley was seen winding from the village towards her house. She occupied one seat of it, in company with a snarling, snapping dog, "Trap." She was a handsome woman, dark as a gipsy, with an arrogant cast of countenance, and keen, flashing eyes, her widow's cap suiting well her style of heavy Opposite to her sat her children in their deep mourning Blanche, an elegant child of ten, with deficate feature and flaxen curls shading her rosy cheeks, a perfect little beauty; Sir Philip, a stout hoy of nearly six, his face brost and coarse, his eyes, hair, and complexion nearly colourles. Not one of the three bore the slightest resemblance to either of the others; but Blanche was very like her late fath. Sir Harry Ashley.

The carriage was going at a slow pace up the hill, who an old woman, neatly attired, leaning on the arm of stalwart man dressed in velveteen, approached it from the side of the road, her hands raised and her tips moving, a if she would crave speech of Lady Ashley. The latter haughtly averted her head, but a second thought scenario to strike her, and she ordered the coachman to stop:

It was Watson, the gamekeeper, and his mother. He had not been discharged with the rest of the servants: porhaps his turn had not yet come. He drew uside while the aged woman, very tall in her day, but stooping now, approached, and hid her hand on the door of the carriage for support, and addressed Lady Ashley in respectful terms, imploring the continuance of the pension she had so long enjoyed. Twice had she been to Ashley to endeavour to obtain speech of her ladyship, who had refused to see her.

"I will not renew your pension for a day," replied Lady Ashley. "You never ought to have had it: it has been o much money taken from my children."

"Oh, mamma," whispered Blanche, the tears rising in her blue eyes, "do give it her! Papa was so fond of old Hannah."

"My leddy, it is not many years I can trouble the world." I am turned fourscore. It will be a hard thing for me to go into the workhouse. Indeed, I was brought up far above what you see me now."

"Brought up to absurd Scotch superstitions," retorted Lady Ashley, "and the best thing you can do is to return and live amongst them. Do you see that child?" indicating her boy.

The old lady east her dim eyes across the carriage, beyond Blanche. "God bless him for a bonnie boy!" she aspirated, "but he is one on Ashley."

"Not an Ashley!" sharply spoke up her ladyship.

"I mean me harm, my leddy; ye didna think I could ever speak it of you or him. And if he has na the ken o' the Ashleys, he is but as God made him. The little lassic thus, but me he."

"He is Sir Philip Ashley," repeated Lady Ashley, with marked emphasis, bending her head forward, till her face was almost close to Hannah's. "You once insulted me by saying my child must be Sir Ryle, to inherit Ashley after his father."

"My heldy," cried the old woman, carnestly, "when they came home and told me good Sir Harry was gone, and that it was a Sir Philip who had succeeded him, I mae believed them, I didna indeed. I know that in the course o' nature Sir Ryle ought to ha' come next, and I canno think now that it's a' canny, a' as it ought to be. We reckoned that the heir to succeed Sir Harry would be Master Ryle, Mr. Arthur's son. We knew there was this child of Sir Harry's, as well as Mr. Arthur himself, that stood between little Ryle and the title, but we believed that it would be surely brought about, as it always had been brought about, and that Master Ryle would now be the chief o' Ashley. My leddy, are ye sure that it is all straight? There was a Sir Massleyb way into Ashley once, but he was proved to be a usurper, and was driven out o' it. Are ye sure this chis the rightful heir?"

What there could have been to excite Ludy Ashley these words was best known to herself, but excited she to unseemly fury, and she set the dog on the old wome "Have at her, Trap ! Seize her! Bite her! Hiss-s-s-3. Have at her, good Trap!"

The dog sprang at Hannah, fury, like that of his mistre scated in his face. But generous little Blanche, with a c of grief, threw herself before the helpless old woman, a the dog seized her by the chin.

Lady Ashley disengaged the dog, he was obedient to he and Blanche, in the midst of her terror, thought not a her own hurt, though the dog had drawn blood. "Dea Hannah, good Hannah," she sobbed, clasping the aga hands, "I am very sorry. When I grow up and have money of my own, I will give it to you; you may be sun I will, because my dear papa did."

"God help us!" muttered the gamekeeper, as he sprang forward to drag his mother out of the way of the moving carriage, "and God help them who come after us, if Sir Philip should resemble his mother in wickedness of temper, as that drowned young Carnagie did!"

CHAPTER XIL

"I DO NOT UNDERSTAND."

LINDEN, the pretty house jutting on Ashley Park, was once more alive with voices, for Arthur Ashley and his family suddenly returned to it.

"What have you been doing to yourself?" demanded little Surgeon Gay, gazing in dismay at his shattered appearance.

"What have other people been doing to me?" retorted Mr. Ashley. "I have been ailing ever since the last spring I passed here, when I had inflammation of the lungs. I don't think I was thoroughly cured."

"I told you you were not. I told you you had no business to return to public life, worrying yourself over your political schemes."

"It is very easy to preach prudence, Gay, but when a man has a family to provide for, how can be sit idly down? My certain income, arising from Thorneliff, is barely four hundred a year, and, with this house, that is all I have."

"Better he idle than work yourself out of health and life, as you have been doing."

"Working for little end. I could not keep out of pecuniary embarrassment, and the annoyance that has caused me, combined with the frustration of my political hopes and the cloud which Lady Ashley managed to cast upon my name and spirit, have been too much for me.

Now that I can no longer stave off my illness, I have eq. back to Linden and quiet. I ruptured a blood-vessel about a month ago,"

"Ah, it is the way with you all putting off, puttin off! If you had lived here, you would have been well no and have saved house-rent."

"That is why I have come," said Mr. Ashley, with laugh, which sounded more sad than merry, " to save house rent and to economize. "Will you believe it, Gay?" h added, dropping his voice; "we keep now but two servants I cannot afford more, and Mrs. Ashley works herself to a skeleton amongst the children."

"I never could have thought to see that reverse of the natural order of things—an Ashley reduced to two handmaids," observed the surgeon, his face twisted into a look of comical concorn. "Why, I and Mrs. Gay manage as much as that. Oh, well, cheer up : Arthur Anhley will never stop long at that low ebb. You know that Sir Harry: left you a handsome fortune, five-and-twenty thousand pounds, and that tigress of a woman destroyed the will?"

"I know, I know. I shall demind it of her. The money is mine by every law of justice,"

"You will never get it," cried Surgeon Gay. "You can form no idea of the way she goes on, the awful things she does. A pretty life you and Major Hayne would have had of it with her as guardians to the children."

"Is Major Hayne here?"

"Major Hayne ! he went off the day after Sir Harry's funeral. The neighbourhood was scandalized that you were not invited to it, and her ladyship had a few hard names bestowed upon her, I can tell you. Major Hayne called on me as he went away, and sat for half an hour on my surgery-counter, talking about her. She had turned him out of Ashley, she had, indeed, Mr. Arthur, as true as that by name's Ned Gay. He said he was going, then, to see if he could make things right for you and your eldest son, and he might be back in a few weeks or a few months, as the case might be."

"Make things right for me and my son I" echoed Mr.

Ashley. "Going where?"

e How should I know? To Timbuctoo, for anything I can tell. I could make neither top nor tail of what he said, and told him so, but he did not explain."

"When is the best time for seeing her ladyship?"

demanded Mr. Ashley.

"She makes a point of being denied to every one who is on her had books, go at what time they will. Spire Prontcalled one day, and my hady sent word out she was not at home, and stood at the French window all the while, staring him in the face. You will never get in."

"I will," replied Mr. Ashley. "And you have heard of the Ashley will. Sir Harry did not possess it, but my father and Sir Arthur did. I will try mine."

"If you would take my advice, you would not go at all. Great excitement might prove fatal to you: and I'll defy any one to stave off excitement, if they get into a contest with Lady Ashley."

" "I must take care of my wife and children," was the reply. "I'll try and take care of myself,"

That same evening, as Lady Ashley sat alone in her dining-room after dinner, the door opened and Mr. Ashley appeared before her. She was inexpressibly surprised, not knowing him to have returned to the neighbourhood, but soon her face lighted up into a glow of triumph, and she motioned him to a seat.

He sat down in the old seat of his boyhood, for it was the home where he had been brought up, brought up to consider himself its heir. And its heir he had been, until she, with her studied fascinations, had wile lover his une in his advancing years to marry her, and so had deprive him of it.

"To what circumstances am I indebted for the hone of a visit from Mr. Ashley?"

"Your question and surprise are natural, Lady Ashley for it is indeed a matter of astonishment that my footstep should have brought me to this house, when it has cease to be my uncle's."

"The house is mine," she answered, indecent satisfaction lighting her dark face. "You formerly thought that who Sir Harry was gone it would be yours."

"I did not come here to recriminate or to speak of the past, Lady Ashley," he observed, "but of the present. Sh Harry Ashley made a will before he died."

"He plotted one; he and Major Hayne. I prevented its being carried out."

"He made one, I believe," repeated Mr. Ashley: " made it and signed it."

"And I rendered it invalid, I tell you. I tore and burst it before their faces. A couple of old idiots! with their annuities here, and their legacies there: the largest one was to Mr. Arthur Ashley. They bound my power down to nothing, and left him, one of the idiots, and Mr. Arthur Ashley, absolute over my children. Did you think I would submit to that, from what you knew of me as Lauretta Carnagie?"

She cast the light of her flashing eyes full upon him. To understood their strange, hidden meaning: understood; as none other could have done.

"The legacy was five-and-twenty thousand pounds, as I is given to understand," he resumed,

"I dare say it was, that or more. The amount is of no assequence."

Of every consequence, for that legacy must be mine. Will you hear what I have to say, Lady Ashley—hear it without ridicule?"

" "Say on."

- "If you look at me, you will see that I must speedily follow my uncle. I am dying of the malady which took my father—disease of the lungs. Save a very poor income, I shall leave my wife and five children unprovided for. This money, which Sir Harry left to them, will increase it to riches—if we estimate riches by my present fortune; and it is theirs by every right. To you, Lady Ashley, it is a trifling sum, and your children will not miss it. Let it be theirs."
- 44 Upon what ground do you urgo your request?"
- "The ground of right; of equity; and "—he sank his voice to a whisper, and drew his chair nearer to hers—"upon restitution. You know you owe me that, Lady Ashley, for to you I date the rain of my health and prospects."

"Ah!" she said, whilst a curious smile curled her mouth.

the public road of this village, that I had drowned you child, an accusation which you knew to be as false as I did, depriving me of my seat in the House, turning the public mind against me, you struck me my death-blow. When I saw my friends looking coldly upon me—friends from infancy, who should have known me better—I could not bear up against it. Never strong, my energies seemed to desert me, and I have since then been a failing man, lacking the spirit to make things prosper. And now that I have confessed this, let it pass for ever. Take my forgiveness, Lady Ashley, now, as we sit here alone, for all you have dealt to me, but deal with compassion by my children. For myself I do not ask the money: let it come to them, if you will, until after my death."

"You speak of compassion," she returned; "which us has most need of compassion, you or 1.7"

"I do not understand,"

"If I have blighted your prospects, who blighted heart, my fair morning of life?"

He repeated, "I do not understand," but this time faltering tone, as if he did understand, at least partially,

"When I came to Ashley, a young stranger, who pra my beauty, admired my waywardness, which others a demned, and stroye in secret, with his honeyed we to win the affections of my numiden heart? And w he had drawn me to love him, with a fiery, ar lent pase that you cold Europeans little reck of, he told me that had only been playing with messethat he loved anotl Do you know who that man was, Arthur Ashley?"

He did not answer that it was himself, though he mi have done so. But she certainly put the case strongly,

"I would have hid down my life for you," she went passionate tears forcing themselves to her eyes with vivid painfulness of the retrospect. "I could have low you for ever. You were, as I thought then, the undoubleir to Ashley, but had you become a beggar, scorn traduced, despised, I should have gloried in loving you the more. I do not know—in spite of my hatred to y—that the love has quite left my heart."

"It was done in thoughtlessness," he murmured; never meant to make such an impression upon you. Ill could I, when I was engaged to marry Anna Rivers?"

"Don't mention her in my presence," she vehement interrupted; "her name has been to my feelings, sine as a searing iron. And you come to ask aid for her at her children! You are a bold man, Arthur Ashley."

pon my wife. She does not deserve them, for she was mocent and unconscious throughout the whole business. Calone was to blame, and perhaps you also, Lady Ashley, a some measure. But let us forget these grievances; surely they took place long enough ago."

"I told you that evening you remember it-that I would never forget. I never will."

"But you will forgive?"

"I will never forgive, you or yours. You present yourself here to demand a fortune for your wife and children:
I would not give them a piece of bread if they were starving in the streets. I hope that your conduct will be visited upon her for whom you forsook me; that in her lowly widowhood she will be overwhelmed with cares and poverty; that she will stop at Linden to live—or starve—and feast her envious eyes, daily, with my prosperity and my children's position and riches: the position she expected to occupy, when they deemed you the undisputed heir to Ashley."

"Cease, cease, I pray you," he implored, lifting his thin hands; "these sentiments are not befitting a woman; they would befit ----"

"A fiend, perhaps you would like to say"—for he had hesitated. "Well and good. Who made me a fiend? You did, Arthur Ashley. In that one evening you changed my heart—happy in you and your image, and which you might have moulded to your will, even to good—you changed it into a sea of hatred, revenge, jealousy, all struggling for mastery as do the flames of a living fire. The struggle is not yet over, the revenge partly is: you and she are reduced to becoming my despised supplicant and I reign at Ashley. Fare you well, sir. Our pat lie apart, as you willed it then."

She rose and pointed imperiously to the door. He also, and stoot looking at her; possibly debating himself whether he should make another effort to so her. Soften that malignant countenance! With a motion of the hand, by way of adjen, he passed out of room.

The disappointment seemed to have taken from him will little energy was left, and he would sit silent for him brooding over the gloomy prospects of his children when a should be no more. And so, May passed into Jurwhen a rupture of a blood-vessel again took place, but very slight one.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE MAJOR'S STORY.

ONE evening, towards the latter part of the month, a sister was announced. "A gentleman," the maid said, and Arthur's tottering limbs rose to receive him. It was Jajor Hayne. Many years had chapsed since they met at he christening of Carmagie.

"" Is this your wife?" exclaimed the Major, taking Anna's ands, and giving her fair cheek a fatherly kiss. "She loes not look very strong."

"She is over-worked and over-unxious, Major. I told Anna yesterday, if I could have foreseen how all this was to end, I would never have married her. I shall soon leave her to a life of struggle with the world. Five young children, and very little provision for them."

rising to her eyes, "if you could only persuade him to think of these things in a less gloomy light! I am as rich as I care to be; we manage very well. He thinks I have so much to do; but I am glad of it, for an active life suits me. I should be quite happy, if it were not for my anxiety about him: but I know he would get well, if he strove to rally his spirits."

"My dear, I have no doubt you are very comfortable and quite rich enough," said the Major, in a gay tone.
"Your husband estimates his income by what it would have been had he succeeded to Ashley, so of course suffers by comparison. What should you say at comin into Ashley now, Arthur? You are still the next heil Who knows but you may?"

"Who knows but I may be king of England?" retoric Mr. Ashley. "Sir Philip is a strong, hearty lad, and i am a dying man. It is but right that the direct heis should succeed."

The Major gave a grunt, which ended in a hugh,  $r_{0}$  and walked sharply across the room, smiling still. He s down again by Mr. Ashley.

"I have an o'd maxim, Ryle---"

"Arthur," interrupted Mr. Ashley.

"Never mind; you are more like your father than ever and I forget to call you anything but Ryle. Who is that?

A handsome boy of ten had entered the room, with the bright complexion, the fair curls, and the noble feature characteristic of the Ashleys.

"That is Ryle, if you will," said Mr. Ashley. "My eldest son. Ryle, speak to Major Hayne."

The child advanced with the fearless step of a your chieftain, and held out his hand with a modest, pleasal look in his large grey eyes, as they were raised to the stranger.

"Upon my word, but you are a brave lad!" muttere Major Hayne, in tones of gratification. "You wonk make a fitter chief than the ungainly little chap who bears the title. What should you say at being called Sk Ryle?"

"I wish papa could have been Sir Arthur," answerd he boy, holdly, "because he would not have turned off all e poor people. But Mr. Gny says that when Philip gets chough, perhaps he will take them on again. Blanche dd: she says so."

$ Do you see much of your cousins?"

"No, sir. We met in the lane one day and were wilding ak-balls together, but when Lady Ashley heard of it, she logged them both, and said she would flog them ten times vorse if they ever spoke to us again. We are not so rich s they are."

And if they grew poor and you grew rich-if you lived & Ashley, for instance, and Blanche and Philip in a small iouse like Linden-would you object to play with them secause they were poor?"

. "No, no," answered the boy; "I would ask them to iome and live with us at Ashley."

"You'll do, my boy," exclaimed the Major. "Always a kind and considerate to others: remember to be so when vou are Sir Ryle."

"You may go and play, Ryle," interposed Mr. Ashley, a touch of vexation perceptible in his tone. "For goodness" ake, Major," he added, as the lad left the room, "do not put such notions in the poor children's heads; it will only be worse for them hereafter. I strive to render them humble."

"I called in on Gay as I came along," observed the Major, "and a precious account he gave me of her ladyship. Why, she has been playing up Old Nick with the estate and the people since her husband died."

"Oh, it is shameful! It excites me to think of it. A disgrace to the very name of Ashley."

" Arthur," resumed Major Hayne, waiting till Mr. Ashley's fit of coughing had subsided, "I was about to say, when interrupted by Master Ryle, that I hold to an old maxim, Look on the bright side of things, but prepare for the worst.' I want you to do the same. You will get well if you take care ----"

"The blood-yessel---"

&quot;Nonsense about the blood-vessel! You'll get over it, I tell you, if you take care; but, to carry out my max I would have you prepare for the other side of the case. once asked Sir Harry if he had made his will; permit; to ask you the same question."

"Yes; such as it is; with nothing to leave."

"Well, I would have you make another, and with t least possible delay. Send for your lawyer to-more morning—send to him to-night, that he may be here i the morning. Make it as if you or Ryle, failing you were in possession of Ashley. Leave directions for a things; the disposal of the property, the guardianship, your children; just as if you were the reigning baronet."

"But Philip is the baronet," returned Mr. Ashley, looking at Major Hayne as if he doubted his sanity.

"Never you mind about Philip. Do as I tell you."

"I cannot, Major Hayne. I cannot will away property that is not mine."

The Major rose from his sent and walked about, as before glancing furtively at Mr. Ashley.

"Now if you could only undertake to keep yourself calm and not excite that blood-vessel you are so fond of, I would let you into a secret. Do you think I may, Mrs. Ashley?

"Cortainly you may. Arthur's spirits and health me altogether too low, now, to be dangerously excited," she

"Well, I'll try it," answered the Major. "You blamed me, Arthur, for raising notions in Master Ryle, but suppose I tell you that he is certain, if he lives, to be Sir Ryle Ashley ? "

"I should say you were speaking very foolishly -with your pardon, Major,"

"And if I add that he, Ryle, is the present heir-apparent?"

"That he cannot be. When I die, he will be Philips heir-presumptive."

"But you are not dead: you are alive and talking. What man this husband of yours is, Mrs. Ashley; persisting in atting himself out of the world, like this! Ryle is the resent heir-apparent."

"To Philip?" uttered the bewildered Mr. Ashley.

"No. To you. What shall you say, yet, if I add that on are Sir Arthur Ashley?"

"Oh!" ejaculated Mrs. Ashley, rising in concern, "Sir Philip must be dead! Poor child! What has happened, Major Hayne?"

Not he, he is as live and fat as ever, but he is not Sir Philip Ashley. Arthur, you are the real, genuine, bond fide baronet and have been since the moment of your uncle's death."

They sat in consternation. "It is not possible," whispered

Mrs. Ashley.

- "It is," returned the Major. "You, my dear, are the legitimate Lady Ashley, and that old harridan up at the house is only the dowager. It is true, as I am a living man. Now don't go and make your hands tremble like that, sir, or I'll unsay all I have said."
- "Do explain yourself," gasped Arthur, falling back in his chair. "How can it be?"
- A The boy, Philip, is a usurper, a palmed-off heir. Neither her child nor Sir Harry's."
- 🦫 "Not their child ? "
  - "No more than he is yours or mine."

"But she was confined at St. Onest of a male child, who was named Phillip?"

"She was. Hut after I and Sir Harry departed, leaving ther there, for she said, in her laziness, she was not well enough to travel, that child died. What did my lady do? Instead of writing to Sir Harry, she hushed the matter up, and took an infant in the village, who had lost its parents, as Philip's substitute, and brought him home, six mont afterwards, as the heir to Ashley."

"But," debated Mr. Ashley, running over probabiliti and improbabilities in his mind, as a man of judgment new fails to do, "how could she have concealed it from the attendants, those she had with her?"

"She had only Nana, the coloured woman, who would g through fire and water at her hidding, and the child's nure a native of St. Onest. Nana must of course have been in the secret, and the nurse she discharged when they reache Paris. Oh, I have got all particulars, signed, scaled, and sworn to, besides that very nurse, and a woman mand Marie Baux, the false child's next-of-kin, from whom my lady got him, and a clerk from the mairie, as they call if, to swear to the register. He's a fellow with a beard a foot long, and frightened the barmaid at the Ashley Arms into hysterics when I took them there just now, to be ledged for the night,"

"How came you with them?" inquired Arthur.

"I have been to St. Ouest, hunting them up, and a long job I have had of it, for some of them were scuttered When I came here last Ohristmas and saw Philip, his remarkable fairness struck upon me with wonder, and I told both Sir Harry and Lady Ashley he was not the child born at St. Ouest, for that child had been dark as night. They insisted it was; at least she did, Sir Harry only spoke rom her: though he did tell me the change in the boy's kin and eyes had astonished him, when Ludy Ashley arst brought him home. Sir Harry's suspicious were not awakened; it was hardly likely; and it is as well they were not, with death so near. Mine, however, were more than suspicions, they were certainties, and away I went to St. Ouest. I found out my hady's trick, collected the evidence. in all due form, the certificate of the real Philip's death and purial, with the registering clerk, as I tell you, to swear to t, and brought the two women to confront my lady, in case of her proving restive. She'll have a surprise she little looks for to-morrow morning."

"It is wonderful!" uttered Mr. Ashley, scarcely able to believe his own senses.

"Rather so. My stars! what a mistake Sir Harry made in marrying that woman 1 But, Arthur, why do you suppose she did all this?"

"With the view to reigning over Ashley, I suppose, as mother of the heir."

"Guess again, my boy. That motive may have had its weight, but her chief nim was to prevent your succeeding to Ashley. Hatred to you, from all I can hear and see, seems to have been the moving spring of her married life."

"Ah, no doubt," answered Mr. Ashley, in evasive tones,

"And serve you right, Master Arthur, if her hatred had only extended to trifles," whispered the Major, beyond the hearing of Mrs. Ashley. "You young gallants think that to make sport of a woman's heart is fair game, but you get paid out sometimes."

"She has paid me out pretty sharply," responded Arthur, the tone of his voice betraying both consciousness and annoyance,

"She has, and he shot to her. Well, her turn will come to-morrow. Will you do what I suggested? Graystock I shall want myself, and have secured him, but you can have somebody from his office."

"You mean about my will. What hurry is there for a day or two?"

"It will be better done. I wish it."

"Then I will certainly do it. I am under unbounded obligations to you, Major Hayne."

CHAPTER XIV.

CHEATING DOES NOT ALWAYS PROSPER.

Major Hayne did not do his work by halves. He had made his preparations before his visit to Arthur, and the following day he waited upon Lady Ashley. Not alone, He had pressed into the service the high sheriff of the county, Colonel Rusherford, an old and faithful friend of Sir Harry's. Mr. Graystock, the hawyer, and little Mr. Gay, the surgeon, the Major also took with him. The French witnesses were close at hand.

Ferocious as Ludy Ashley's fits of passion it al sometimes been, they were as nothing compared with the one which overtook her when Major Hayne opened his business. She denied everything; she swere the child, Philip, was hers; she would have quitted the room and refused to listen, but they compelled her to remain. "When your hadyship shall be calm, we will discuss this matter quietly," said Colond Rusherford, "and the steps which must be taken."

"There is nothing to discuss," she impetuously retorted.

"How dare you come here with your plotting tales that Sir Philip is not the rightful heir?"

"Philip Ashley died at St. Ouest, and was buried there," said Major Hayne. "He died of convulsions, and his grave is on the outside of the Catholic cemetery: and I have taken the liberty, ma'am, of putting a gravestone over it which you forgot to do. This child, whom you call Sir Philip, is Robert Baux, the son of the postilion who was killed driving you and Sir Harry into St. Ouest. Do you deny having adopted that man's child?"

"It is false, it is an infamous fabrication," she reiterated, after a momentary hesitation. "I adopted no child, and my own did not die."

"Take care, Lady Ashley," interposed Major Hayne, "I have just returned from St. Onest and have brought with me ample proofs. On the evening of the day on which your child was buried you went with Célestine, one of the maids at the inn, to Baux's house, and offered to adopt the infant orphan. Marie Baux, the aunt, to whom the charge of the postition's children had fallen, delivered the infant to you then, and Célestine carried it to the inn. Célestine is here, Lady Ashley."

Lady Ashley was visibly startled. "Here!"

"Outside. Waiting to be called in."

"And you would believe the word of a miserable servantgirl in preference to mine!" she uttered, recovering her equanimity. "Colonel Rusherford, I am surprised that you should have lent your countenance to so infamous a business."

"Celestine is not alone, my lady," imperturbably proceeded Major Hayne. "Marie Baux is with her. And the wet-nurse is also with her; the one who nursed your child first, and this false Philip afterwards, and whom you sent back to St. Ouest, after reaching Paris. And the official who registered the death of your child has come over with the three women to take care of them."

"Lady Ashley," interposed Colonel Rusherford, "I do not wish to hurt your feelings, but the fraud is undeniable and the proofs are at hand. Under these circumstances, it will cause you least pain to give up Ashley quietly. I do no mean this day—Sir Arthur would not wish that; but so between now and a week's time."

"Sir Arthur!" she ejaculated, as if paralyzed.

"Sir Arthur," calmly repeated Colonel Rusherford "Ashley is his now, and he has been wrongfully kept out of it since his uncle's death."

"And in giving you a week to get out of it, ma'am, Sig Arthur and Lady Ashley will show more consideration for you than you have shown for them," added Major Hayne,

The words seemed to stun her. "Sir Arthur and Lady Ashley!" Had it come to that at last, after all her sinfal manacuvring? She fell back in her chair, and her face assumed a livid hue through its dark skin.

"Should you over cause one infant to personate another again, my lady," proceeded Major Hayne, "take care that their eyes and skin are not so remarkably dissimilar. There's the point that did for your scheme."

She sprang from her seat, fury in her voice and gesture. "I care not what you say—you are all in a plot against me. Philip is Sir Philip Ashley, and you shall not disposess him."

Then they called in the witnesses, and the child, Philip, was fetched from the nursery by Mr. Gay. He alone would have been sufficient evidence, for he was the very image of Marie Baux, his father's sister. The latter chasped him to her with kisses and tears; she knew the Baux face; there was no mistaking it.

There is no necessity to pursue the bringing home of the proofs to Lady Ashley. They were too powerful to be confuted, even by her, or by a gentleman from the lawyer's office, who had been galloped for in red-hot laste; and the conviction forced itself upon her, in the midst of her stormy passion, that she must indeed abandon Ashley. And now arose a secondary punishment. Sir Harry Ashley, in his will, had provided for the contingency of Philip's death, and Arthur's consequent succession, and had amply provided for his wife and Blauche. That will she had destroyed, and a large portion of the money that would have been hers, now came to Arthur Ashley.

When the sad dispute and the confusion of the day came to an end, the gentlemen quitted Lady Ashley. Mr. Graystock departed for home, but the other three turned towards Linden, to report to Sir Arthur. Who should they meet on their way but the gamekeeper, Watson, moving his goods and chattels; his old mother and youngest child scated at the top of the cart, his wife and the elder children walking behind it.

"Hallo, Watson I" cried Surgeon Gay, "where are you decamping to ?"

"My hady has turned me out, gentlemen," sadly answered the man. "She gave me warning, and for fear I should not go to my time, which was to-day, sent in a man this morning to enforce it, and keep possession. I have taken a cottage over the hill, and Squire Prout has promised to find me employment. Oh, sirs! my heart's almost broken. I never thought to see Ashley come to this."

"Just turn the horse's head round," said Major Hayne.

" Sir ? "

"Turn round and go back to the lodge and put your goods in again," he added to the bewildered gamekeeper. "If the man disputes it, tell him to come down to Lindon, and get his orders from Sir Arthur Ashley. Her ladyship is nothing but the downger, without any power whatever, for the child, Philip, was no son of Sir Harry's, Sir Arthur is your muster now."

"The Lord be thanked I" uttored the relieved man.

"It's like awaking from a nightmare."

"Are ye sure it is Sir Arthur, sirs?" cried the old lady from her high seat, though tears of joy were falling from her eyes. " Are ye sure it is mae Sir Ryle?"

"Why Sir Ryle?" demanded Colonel Rusherford, with smile. "Why not Sir Arthur?"

"Ye ken weel, Colonel Rusherford, that Sir Ryle mis come after Sir Harry; that it always has come. I knew there was something not straight, not canny, when they said there was a Sir Philip; and I dinna think now it will be Sir Arthur."

"But it is Sir Arthur, ma'am," responded Major Hayas "And has been ever since Sir Harry's death, if we had but

"But we did nue know it, sir," persisted the old ladgi "and he never reigned. No, no, it will me be Sir Arthur, now, to come into Ashley."

They pursued their way, leaving the gamekeeper to turn his cart round. When near to Linden, little Ryle met them running in great agitation.

"Oh, sir," he exclaimed to Surgeon Gay, "make haste to my dear father. He is a great deal worse, and his mouth w

"The blood-vessel again !" muttered the doctor to Majo Hayne; "this is what I feared when I told you yesterday t get him to a speedy settlement of his affairs. Come along Master Ryle ; let us have a run."

He was a spare, active man, and sped along as fast at Ryle. They soon gained the house. "You stop outside, ny dear," he said, " while I go in."

"There's mamma watching for you," returned Ryle.

"Where is he, Lady Ashley?" asked the surgeon. hich room ? "

In the midst of her distress she started at the title, almost the other Lady Ashley had done. Where ease and rank leed her husband's, now that he was dying ?

in a short time the doctor came out again. The two tlemen and the little boy were on the lawn before the ise. For merry Surgeon Gny, he was looking very sad. "The old lady was right," he whispered to the former, ir Arthur was not fated to reign; this child is already of of Ashley."

Tyle, of a quick, sensitive nature, whose fears were already the work, noted the hushed voices, the pained looks. Tapa is worse !" he quickly cried to Mr. Gay, "and they to been telling me that he is Sir Arthur Ashley. Oh, I he is not dead, is he?"

My dear child," said the surgeon, taking Ryle's hand, our father is gone to a better world. See how bright d beautiful it looks up there," he added, pointing to the m blue summer sky. "No storms, no anger, no death; peace and love and pleasautness. I wish the time was no for us all to be there." But Sir Ryle sank down on grass with a wailing cry.

On as fair a day as that, they entered on their home at hley; Lady Ashley, in her deep sorrow and her widow's eds, with her younger children and her eldest child, its mer. Very speedily had Lauretta, Lady Ashley, when a found it must be, evacuated Ashley. Sir Arthur had sired, in the will made the morning of his death, that the operty left to her by Sir Harry in the will which she had ndered nugatory might be given up to her upon one contion—that Blanche should be brought up at Ashley, under a care of his wife Aum. For the welfare of the little rl, and the honour of the name of Ashley, he would not fier her to remain with her mother, if he could by any caus prevent it. Lauretta, Lady Ashley, agreed to this, arough her solicitor, Mr. Storm, and seemed rather glad an otherwise to be relieved of the trouble of Blanche.

She announced her intention of departing for India, the favourite home of her earlier days. England was a village country to live in, she said, and Englishmen were ruffing false and detestable—she would take herself away from the Major Hayne, who had the management of Sir Arthur affairs, was in glee when he heard it, and sent a politimessage back, that, failing an escort, he would conduct by thither himself, sooner than India should be disappointed of her. As to Philip (so to call him), he was laden with toys and sent back to St. Ouest, with his aunt and the other two, and the man with the heard, a small annual being settled on him for life.

So the place returned to its former pence, for recht wrongs were all righted, and old Hannah Watson said should wait her call for departure with calmness, now the Sir Ryle reigned, in his own turn, over Ashley.

THE ENGAGEMENT OF SUSAN CHASE.

THE ENGAGEMENT OF SUSAN CHASE.

CHAPTER I.

LIEUTENANT CARNAGIES

LADY and gentleman were pacing a covered walk one all day in November. Both were young: he had someting of a military air about him; a tall, thin man, very ark. She was fair, with a calm face and pleasant expression. Just now, however, her features were glowing with nimation, her checks burning, and her eyes cast down; or he, Charles Carmagie, had been telling her that he loved our; and she would rather have his love than that of the whole world beside.

Lieutenant Carangie had come on a visit in the neighbourhood. He had accidentally met with Susan Chase the very first day of his arrival, and he had contrived to meet her pretty nearly every day since, now some weeks, so that love had grown up between them. A gossiping letter, love had grown up between them. A gossiping letter, received that morning from a brother officer, spoke of a rumour that their regiment was about to be ordered the West Indies: and this had caused him to speak out.

"You know, Susan," he said, "I cannot go without you A decrear blush still, then a troubled expression, and sh half raised her eyes. "Manuna will not consent to that she will say I am too young."

- "Susan --- " laughed Mr. Carnagie.
- Well?" for he seemed to have found some source of amusement, and laughed still.
- "Do you remember the other evening, when the Maithad came to tea, and the conversation turned on marriage, you mother informed us she was married at seventeen. You are eighteen, so she cannot consistently bring forward you youth as an objection."
- "Yes; but she also said that early marriages were ......"
- "That early marriages were the incarnation of impradence and impropriety," interrupted Mr. Carmeje, " laying the foundation for all the disasters that flesh is heir to from an unconscionable share of children, to a ruined pocket and wretched health. My dearest Susan, we will risk them all, and cite her own example when she holds out against as."
- "Look at the rain I" suddenly exclaimed Miss Chase, as they came to an opening in the trees. "How long can it have begun?"
- " It's coming down pretty smartly too. There are worst misfortunes at sea, Susan. We can turn back again and wait its pleasure. You are under shelter here."
- "But indeed I dare not stay longer. I wonder what the time is? Will you look, please?"

Mr. Carnagie took out his watch. "It is at the moment. of twelve,"

- "Twelve | " she exclaimed, in astonishment. Charles, we have been here an hour and a half. " Twelvet татта вау р 🤊 -What will
- "Nothing. When she hears what we have to tell hor."
  - "Oh, Charles 1 I only went out to take a manage of he cottage. And she knows I might have been back in minutes. Indeed I must husten in."

He opened his umbrella, which he had brought with him, or rain had been threatening all the morning; and, causing ser to take his arm, held it over her. She walked timidly: t was the first time she had ever taken it; and the moment shey came within view of the house, she relinquished it.

"Susan, what's that for ?"

"Don't you see mamma at the window?" she faltered.

kke courage; a few minutes more, and she will know that this all as it should be."

Mr. Carnagic took possession of her hand, intending to make it again a prisoner; but Susan drew it away, and harried off in the rain, leaving him and his umbrella to follow at leisure.

She bounded into the hall, out of breath. Her mother came and met her. Mr. Carnagie was not far behind.

"Susan, where ever have you been?" exclaimed Mrs. Chase, motioning her into the sitting-room. "What has detained you?"

Of course she had no excuse to offer, and she nurmured something unintelligible; Mrs. Chase only caught the word "rain."

a Rain I you could not have waited for that. It has only just commenced. Where is it that you have been, Susan?"

"I believe I detained her, Mrs. Chase," spoke up young Carnagie. "I was coming here, and met her, and we have been walking in the covered walk."

Politeness kept Mrs. Classe silent. But she did not allow her daughters to walk with young men, either in covered walks or uncovered, and she mentally prepared a lecture for Susan.

"Susan has been making me a promise," resumed. Carnagie, folding and unfolding a piece of paper, which took up from the table.

"Not to go out walking with you again, I hope," has interposed Mrs. Chase. "For I cannot sanction it."

"Not precisely that. Mrs. Chase, she has promised be my wife,"

Mrs. Chase was taken entirely by surprise. complaint, from which she suffered constantly, caused | to be much confined at home, rarely, if ever, to accompa her daughters in their walks or evening visits; therefore she had seen little of the progress of the intimacy. Sus sat down on the sofa, and drooped her face, and nervous played with her bonnet-strings.

"Conditionally, of course," added Mr. Carmagie, "If you have no objection to offer. I trust you will have non Mrs. Chase."

"Dear me ! this is very sudden," was all that lady coal find to utter aloud.

"My family—I believe you know—are of great respects bility; and I possess a few thousands besides my commission I will try to make her happy, Mrs. Chase."

"I have heard you highly spoken of by Sir Arthur, Mr. Carnagie. But still-you must allow me to consider this seriously, before giving a final answer."

"Oh, cortainly. I did not expect anything more. If you will kindly not take too much time," he added, "for l believe there will be little time to spare."

"I do not understand you," said Mrs. Classe.

"I had a letter from Drake, of ours, this morning, and he tells me there's a rumour that we are to be sent off to the West Indies,"

"And you wish for an answer before you leave ? That is natural. You shall have it."

"My dear Mrs. Chase---I wish for her before I leave. I must take her with me."

"Take-are you speaking of Susan?" uttered the astonished Mrs. Chase.

"Of course I am. Several of our officers are married men, and their wives will accompany them out,"

"If Susan were older I would not say you nay; only three or four years older."

- "I cannot go without Susan. I never could endure to leave her behind me, with nothing more binding between us han an engagement : I might have to stop out there for cars, before I could get leave to come home and claim her. Dear Mrs. Chase, if you are satisfied with me in other espects, you must give your consent to our being married it once."
  - "Mr. Carnagie 1 Do you know Susan's age?"

"Yes. Eighteen. And you," he added, with a half-smile, p were seventeen when you married. I heard you say so."

Mrs. Chase looked vexed. "True; that was my age," she answered: "and it is that very fact which has set me against early marriages for my children. They are a great mistake.--Susan, where are you going? Stay and hear what I have to say : it is now litting that you should do so. Sit down again. I have scarcely enjoyed a day's peace since I married, Mr. Carnagio. I had many children, and have had nothing but worry, noise, bustle, toll ! Oh, you don't know the discomfort of early marriages; and I almost made a vow that my daughters should not marry until they were of a proper age."

"May I inquire what you would call a proper age?" he asked, suppressing a smile.

"Well-I think the most proper and the best age would be about five-and-twenty. But certainly not until twenty 6 Susan wants only two years of twenty. Dear Mrs. Cha I must plead that you change your resolution in her as Were I stationary in England, and could occasionally s her, it might be different. I must take her with me,"

"You are not yet sure of going."

138

"No, I am not. Drake thought ......

"We will not discuss it further for the present," into supted Mrs. Chase. "You have nearly startled me out d my sober sonse and judgment."

"Very well. May I come in to-morrow morning?"

"If you like. I will then say yes or no to the engage ment: but without reference to the marriage."

"Now mind, Susan," he snatched a moment to whisper "if your mother still holds out, and yows we must wait a indefinite number of years, we will not wait at all, but ju elope, and settle it that way. It's most unreasonable e her. I can't wait for you, and I won't."

Susan smiled faintly. She was not one of the cloping sort.

The next morning came. Mrs. Chase had resolved to accept Mr. Carnagie, finding that Susan's " mind," as she called it, was set upon him; and indeed, there was no reason why she should not accept him; but when Mr. Carangle came, she found there was something else to be settled He had received a summons to join his regiment, which was then quartered in Iroland, and also a positive, though not official notification, that it was ordered to the West Indies, and would be away in two months. Now, was Susan to go with him or not? Mrs. Chase said no, he said yes: and after much argument on both sides, and some slight indication of relenting on hers, they somehow came to the conclusion that Susan herself should decide the matter.

"My dear, decide prudently," cried Mrs. Chase, "Think call over the fatal objections I have pointed out. Prudence, and !"

"Susin, my darling, decide bravely," eried he: "don't safraid. Think how happy we shall be together!"

And poor Susan, amidst a rush of colour and a flood of icars, decided To GO.

"Oh, dear 1" grouned Mrs. Chase, "there will be no me to prepare you a suitable trousseau, Susan."

"No time!" echoed Mr. Carungio. "I could get an nuffit made and packed in three days, and Susan has twice is many weeks. I should think she might buy up half the hops in Great Britain in that time."

Mr. Carnagio made the best of his way to Ireland, and Susan made the best use of her hands and energies in preparing for her change of prospects. In seven weeks they were to be married, and in eight to sail. Mr. Carnagie had interest with his colonel, and had no doubt of obtaining mother short leave of absence. During this time Mrs. Chase had Susan's miniature taken—to console them, sho said, when Susan should be gone. It was a good likeness, but it flattered her. Susan wrote a merry account of this to Mr. Carnagie.

One day, when Susan's friend, Frances Muitland, had come in to help her with some delicate work, she began speaking of the disposition of Mr. Carnagie.

"Susan, tell me: do you believe he is, on the whole, calculated to make you happy?"

"Is there any reason why he should not be?" was Susan's answer.

"Ho is so fearfully passionate."

"Who says so?" demanded Susan, in tones of resentment.

"Oh, he is. Ask the Ashleys. There was something up about a doz. It was when Charles Carnagic was stopping there. He completely lost all self-control, and rushed his room for his sword. Bessy met him on the stairs; was brandishing it, and looking like a madman. She there was an awful scene. Arthur declares he never bef saw so violent a temper."

"Charles must have been greatly provoked," remark Susan.

"He provoked himself, I believe. However, Susy, if your own affair. I'm sure I don't want to set you again him. Marriage is a lottery at the best: 'for richer's poorer, for better for worse.' You will soon have to s that, you know."

Susan Chase had not soon to say it. The time of the wedding drew on, and on the day previous to that fixe for it, Lieutenant Carnagic arrived at Stopton, having obtained his leave of absence. Mrs. Chase's house was a some distance from it, but it was a line, frosty morning and he set out to walk.

He had come nearly in view of the house when he me a funeral. It startled Mr. Carnagia considerably, for surely it had come from the very house he was bound to. Then were only some half-dozen cottages besides, that the read led to, just there, and that style of funeral was not likely to come from a cottage. He vaulted over a gate by the roadside, and peeped at it through the hedge; a hears and several carriages. When it had passed, he came forth igain, leaned over the gate, and gazed after it. hildren drew near, slowly following the sight in awe, gazors like himself.

"Who is dond?" he inquired of them. that is being taken to the churchyard?" "Who is it

"Mrs. Chase, sir."

"Mrs. Chase !" he uttered, horror-stricken. "What did she die of ? "

The children did not know. Only that "she had died cause she was ill."

"Oan you inform me what Mrs. Chase died of?" the ung officer repeated, for a woman now came up. "Was any accident?"

"No, sir, no accident. She has been ailing a long time, me years, and she got suddenly worse at the last, and id," was the woman's unswer, who evidently did not low Mr. Carnagle. "It was so quick, that her sons did it get here in time to see her, nor the little miss that was school."

He was terribly shocked, scarcely able to believe it.

«When did she die?"

"On Tuesday, sir. Four days ago."

6 Are they not burying her very soon?"

Well, sir, the funeral was first fixed for to-morrow—I acw all about it, you see, because I have been in there, nee, helping the servants. But to-morrow, Saturday, was have been Miss Susan Chase's wedding-day, and I believe to couldn't bear the idea, poor thing t of the funeral's sking place on it—what was to have been so different. Then the next day was Sunday, and some of the family did of like that day, and one of the sons was obliged to be ack at his college on Monday. So they settled it for o-day."

Stunned with the news, Mr. Carnagic turned back. There semed an indelicacy in his going to the house at that soment, and he waited till the after-part of the day, and rent then. A servant showed him into a darkened room, and Susan came to him.

He thought she would have cried herself ill. Her emotion vas pitiable. He clusped her in his arms, and she lay there ad sobbed, almost hysterically, as a child cries. She could give him very little more information than had previously been imparted. Their dear mother's complaint had a an unfavourable turn, and had carried her off, a without warning. One of her brothers, Susan said, written to him on the Tuesday night, after it happy Mr. Carnagie had left Ireland before the letter got then

"Susan," he whispered, when she was a little cal " must this entail a separation on us?"

She looked at him, scarcely understanding.

"Must we wait? Must I sail without you?"

"Charles, that is almost a cruel question," also said longth. "How could you ask it? Would you have marry you before my mother is cold in her grave? A ye at any rate, must pass over."

"It may be much longer than that. I shall not g leave so readily again. Oh, Susan ! this is a hard trial,"

"It is the will of God," she sighed, "and we ma bear it."

"I shall not bear it patiently. I shall get marrying a of the copper, half-caste natives, out of defiance, or some thing as desporate. Fancy what it will be - condemned by vogetate by myself in that stilling climate, and you some millions of miles away 1"

Susan was silent, pained at the tone of the remark. A that moment a girl of fifteen opened the door and looks in; wearing deep mourning, like herself.

"Come in, Emma, darling," she fondly said, drawing he vistor towards her. "This is Mr. Carnagie, who was to have been so nearly related to us to-morrow. Charles," be added, "were there no other reason, I must have stayed protect this child. My mother specially bequeathed her Emma Chase, who bore a resemblance to her sister Susan, It a restraint in this stranger's presence, and she quickly "Well, this is a gloomy prospect for us, Susan," resumed Mr. Carnagie, who could not get over his disappointment. What I say is no mere joke—that it may be years before from come to fetch you."

She raised her eyes to his, in all the expression of their rasting confidence. "No matter how many, Charles, you rill find me waiting for you."

"But it is hard, for all that."

"To you think—pray forgive me if I suggest anything grong, or unpleasing—that if you were to return at once to your duty, without taking the leave granted you now (excepting the time occupied in travelling, which cannot be avoided), that they would be more inclined to allow it you when you next ask for it? It is an idea that has becoured to me."

"Perhaps so. It is not a bad notion. But, Susan, I would rather spend it with you."

"We are so sad just now," she murmured; "all the house is sad."

There was something in her tone which seemed to convey an intination that his presence might not be acceptable to that house of sorrow; or at least Mr. Carmgie funcied so. And he did think her suggestion of going back to his duty a good one.

"Then, Sasan, I think I had better make up my mind to leave you, and start back this very night."

"It may be better," she answered, the tears standing in her eyes.

"And in another year, my durling, if all's well, I trust

I shall come and claim you."

"I trust so," she whispered.

He had in his pocket her wedding-ring, which he had bought as he came through Liverpool, and he drew it forth, and slipped it on to her finger—on the finger he ought to have slipped it on in church on the morrow, eq Susan; now that binds you to me. Let it remain till-until I take it off only to put it on again."

"Not on that finger," she remonstrated, her pale ( flushing. "Why not 2"

"Strangers will think that I am married."

"And in one sense you are so, for we are married heart. Let it remain there for my sake."

"Very well," she murmured.

"Susan, I must now ask something else. The minist that was taken of you,"

Susan hesitated. It was still in her mother's room, what she used to call her "trensure drawer."

"I was to have had the original, and they the likeness he said; "but now that the original will be left at hom I may surely take the miniature. Let me have it, Susan! She went and fetched it.

"And now I will bid you farewell, for if I am to go, must start at once," he said, straining her to him. "Go. bless you, my love I my darling wife that was to have been ! Be true to me, Susan, as I will be true to you."

He departed. But he did not return to his duty, as the had agreed. He meant to do so, but he returned by way of London, and the attraction of the capital proved to much for his resolution. In due course he departed with his regiment for Barbadoes: and poor Susan Chase remained at home, to pine after him, and to wear the plain gold ring he had placed on her finger.

CHAPTER II.

THE TWENTY-NINTH OF MAY.

For three years they did not meet. Nay, it was more; for it was winter when he went, and early summer when he returned. Whether Mr. Carnagie had grown less anxious for his marriage, or that he really could not obtain leave, pertain it is, that for three years and four months Susan did not see him. In his letters, he had pressed much that she should go out and marry him there, but her innate sense of delicacy spoke against it. This prolonged absence had told much on her spirits, somewhat on her health. Her marriage preparations had long been made.

May came in, and lud nearly gone again. On the 29th of that month Susan was scated before the breakfast-table, waiting for her sisters, Ursula and Emma. They were still in the same house: it belonged to their clost brother, and he was unmarried and frequently away from it. The young ladies had their own small fortune, about one hundred a year cach.

The 20th of May was kept as a gala day in their village, and in all that part of the country. Service was read in the church, and a procession walked to it, with banners, and gilded oak balls and branches. It is done away with now, for we are writing of many years ago.

"Is it not a lovely day for the holiday people?" exclaimed Ursula, as she entered, and took her seat opposite Susan, "You will have delightful weather for journey."

Susan was going out on the day but one following short journey of forty miles. Their consin Lacy was a to be married. Her mother was an invalid, confine her chamber, and Susan was wanted to superintend ev

Emma came dancing in, with her merry blue eyes, her shining earls. She was of a careless, gay temperame unlike her thoughtful sisters. "Susy, you look sad." her salutation, "and every soul has some peculiar source gratification to-day. Did you hear the langling cros going by, all the morning, to gather the oak balls?"

"What may be your peculiar source of gratification Emma?" asked Ursula.

"The putting on my new blue dress. You don't kne how well it becomes me. I shall win more hearts at chur to-day than the parson," "You are a vain girl, Emma."

"I think I am," was her laughing answer; " but where the harm of it? Seriously speaking, Susan, were I you, that lientenant of mine did not advertise himself shortly, should give him up. He is the origin of all your sad look I don't think he troubles himself to write often; it is four months since his last letter arrived."

"He may be on his way home," said Susan. "In that letter he stated that he was going to apply for leave."

"Then he might have written to say so, if he is coming. Unless—Susan, I should not wonder—unless he means to take you by surprise !"

Susan aroused herself from a painful reverie. "Yes," she said, "I think he must be on his way to us; I have thought so several times lately," And a happy flush mantled to her cheeks, and she unconsciously twirled the phin gold ring round and round her finger. It was a habit she had fallen into, when her mind was absent.

The day passed on to evening. Some young ladies had come in to spend it with them. Soon after the shutters were closed, and lights brought in, a sound, as of a postchaise, was heard approaching the house. None seemed to take any notice of it; they were not thinking of Mr. Carnagie; Susan's heart alone heat wildly. Had be come?

The door opened, and a tall, gentlemanly man entered. All in the room rose, and he stood in indecision, looking from one to the other. So many young ladies! "It is Charles Carnagie 1" cried Frances Maitland.

"My darling Susan!" he whispered, advancing to one of them, and chesping her tenderly to him. O How thankful I am that we have met again I . But she blushed and smiled, and drew away from him. It was Emma he had gone up lo.

Frances Muithard advanced. "You have made a mistake, Charles. Alt I see you have not forgotten me, but never mind me, just now .- This is not Susan."

" Not Susan 1" he attered.

"Susan, why don't you come forward?" For poor Susan Chase had retreated into the shade. All her heart's life seemed to die within her, when that embrace was given to another. "Susan, I say !"

Miss Maitland was positive in manner, dragged forth Susan, and brought her up to Mr. Carnagic. He took her hand with cold indecision; looked at her, and then looked at Emma.

"You are playing with me," he said. "That is Susan."

"No, indeed, I um Emma," returned that young lady. laughing, and shaking back her sunny ringlets. "But the all say I am exactly like what Susan used to be."

Mr. Carnagie recollected himself. "Susan," he whispered scanning her features, "I think I begin to recognize But you are much altered. I beg your pardon for the take I made,"

"T am Susan," she answered, raising her tearful eyes, "Have you been ill?" be imprired. "You are pale thin."

"No: I have been well. I believe I am thinner t when you went away."

"That comes of fretting," interposed Miss Muitlan-"sighing and fretting after you, Charles Carnagie," A Susan blushed deeply, making her look a little more I

"How was it you never wrote to say you were coming?

"I did write, just before I sailed, stating when I show leave,"

"Then we never received the letter. We thought yo still in Barbadoes,"

Many times in the evening did Mr. Carnagie's eyes rev towards the blooming Emma. Scarcely could be persual himself that she was not Susan. The miniature he had taken with him had been a hundsome likeness of Susan; 3 Emma was now a handsome likeness of what Susan had The linir was of the same colour, dark authorn, dressed in the same style; and to make the illusion more complete, the dress in the painting was light blue. There sat Emma, in her new and handsome light-blue silk dress her blushing cheeks, her flowing ringlets, and her ready smile; and there sat Susan, pale and subdued, her features less rounded than formerly, her bair now worn plain, and her dress, handsome certainly, but a soher brown. She had not cared to adorn herself in the absence of Mr. Carnagie.

The visitors departed, and he and Susan talked over preiminaries that night. Mr. Carnogie had business to do in own; "lots of things;" some his own, some that he had indertaken for his brother officers; he might get it done n three weeks, four at the most : and he proposed that they should be married at once, and go to London together. But to marry so soon, with only a day or two's notice, would be inconvenient, almost unheard of, Susan said. Therefore the wedding was fixed for a month hence, when he should have completed his business, and they would then spend two or three months at a quiet watering-place.

The following morning they breakfasted later than usual. for when Mr. Carnagie, who had promised to breakfast with them, came, he drew Susan out with him into the garden, and began talking to her lovingly, as of old. late did they sit down to breakfast, that the post came in before they had finished. Only one letter, and that for Susan. She opened it.

"It is from my aunt," she said, "urging me to be sure not to disappoint them, and to bring with me the pattern of a pretty spencer, if I happen to have one."

""How like my aunt that is!" laughed Ursula, is always on the look-out for patterns. I believe she must collect them or sell them. You will write to-day, Susan, and explain why you cannot go."

"But-I am thinking," hesitated Susan, "that I can go. Aunt, poor thing, is so helpless, and they have so depended

1 believe I shall be able to go."

"If you could do so, it would be a charity," said Ursula; " for what my aunt will do without you, I cannot conceive. When do you leave for town, Mr. Carnagie?"

"As soon as I can," he answered; "some of my business is in a hurry. Not to-day, for I must give a look in at the Maitlands and other friends: and I have much to talk over yet with Susan. To-morrow I shall leave."

"And it is to-morrow morning that I ought to start,' remarked Susan. "I do not see why I should not go. Ursula can superintend things here in my absence, and shall be back again at the end of a fortnight."

"Mind that you are home in time, Susan," said M Carnagie, with mock gravity.

"I will be sure to be back in time," she laughed. "By I think I ought to go,"

She did go. And had to be at Stopton early the following morning to take the stage-coach. Some of the family went with her, and Mr. Carinagie. "You will have to start in half an hour after me," Susan remarked to him: "only you travel by a different route."

"I am not going to town to day," he answered, "but to-morrow. I had no time to give to the Mairlands yesterday, and they expect me to spend to-day with them."

"Then I think I must say, mind you are back in time," returned Susan, jokingly. He took a fond farewell of her, and she departed on her journey.

Precisely to the day, at the end of the fortnight, Susan was at home again, arriving in the afternoon. One of the first persons she saw, as she entered the home, was Mr. Carnagie.

Glarles ! You here!" she uttered in astonishment: "Have you come down from London?"

"I have not been to London," was Mr. Carnagie's answer; "one thing or another has detained me here. The Maithands tensed me to stay, and I too readily yielded; then I began to reflect how much pleasanter it would be to have you in London with me. So I shall just make myself at ease till the happy day, and we will go there together."

There was something in these words displeasing to the car of Susan. Stay; it was the tone in which they were spoken. It was pressingly eager; as if he were so anxious to justify himself. And never to have written to her!

"You might have sout me a letter, Charles, all this hile."

"In the first week I did not care that you should know had not left, for I was perpetually vowing to be off the ext hour. And since then I have been expecting you very day: Ursula thought you might come home before he fortnight was up."

"You might have mentioned, when you wrote to me, hat Charles was here," said Susan, looking at her sister Traula.

"Mr. Carnagie requested me not to do so."

o To surprise you, Susan," interrupted Mr. Carnagie.

Ursula had spoken gravely; he, eagerly; and Susan wondered. She retired to her own room, to remove her things, and in a few minutes Frances Maitland called, and went up to her.

"What a shame of you, Susy, to leave Charles Carnagio to his own disconsolate self I" was her unceremonious salutation. "And the instant he arrived here, after his three years' absence 1"

- "Nay," said Susan, "he first of all decided to leave me, and go up to town. When I left, I thought he was going also. I think I ought to reproach you, Frances, for having kept him. He says that the Maithands teased him to remain, and he too readily yielded."
  - " He did not say so ( "

"Yes, he did. He has just said so to me,"

- "Well, that's cool!" returned Frances Maithand. shall tell Mr. Charlie of that. If he has been three times in our house, since you left, it is as much as he has vouchsafed us of his society."
  - "Nonsense I" retorted Susan.
- "It is quite true. I'll ask Charlie how much they charge to teach story-telling in Barbadoes."

"Do I understand that you have not seen Charles a than three times since I left home?" returned Miss Cha "There you go again, Susan; catching at words, t stumbling to conclusions ! I said he had not been in than three times inside our house. I have seen him doze of times; for he has been perpetually about the grow and in the park, with Emma. We have come upon the at all hours. Do you not think Emma looks funny ?"

"I have not yet seen Emma," answered Susan, " Wh do you mean by funny?"

"She has become so shy and distant. If we only spea to her, she rushes away. I think Charles Carnegie h scared her out of her self-possession."

"You always were funciful, Frances," 152

"And perhaps always shall be. You would have been better at home than away; at any rate, that's no fancy. 1 have come to ask you to spend this evening with us; and that's no fancy. You, your sisters, and Charles Carnagie,"

"I am rather tired," answered Susan, "but I will come if the rest do."

"It is decided, then, for I asked Ursula as I came in. Some of you can invite Charlie; I may not meet with him. Good-bye, until evening."

When Susan went down to the sitting-room, Uraula and Emma were there. "Let me look at you," due said to the latter, after kissing her fondly. "I want to have a good look at your face. Frances Multhard says you have become queer and shy, and that Charles has scared you out of your Sasan had Emma before her as she spoke, and she was stonished at the violent rush of crimson which her worls called up. Face, neck, ears, were dyed with it. Not only this: Emma began to tremble, and then burst into tears and ran from the room.

Susan could not speak from astonishment. She turned wards Ursula, and saw her looking on with a severe oression.

"What can have come to Emma?" faltered Susan. "Freant it only as a joke. Ursula, you look strange, too. he house altogether seems unlike itself. What can be the latter?"

Ursula did not answer. The scowl on her brow was "Ursulu, I usk you, what is it? You seem angry with

Ursula rose; she was tall and stout, and she threw her area arms round Susan, and whispered;

Not with you, Susan dear. Oh no, not with you. My oor Susan !"

Susan began to tremble, almost as Emma had done. There is some mystery," she breathed.

"Yes, something has occurred. I shrink from the task of dling you."

"Must you tell me? must I know it? I have been soall of peace and happiness of late."

"You must know it, I believe. I scarcely knew whether o tell you or not, and I took counsel of Frances Muitland, then she came in just now, and she says I must do so, he was going to tell you herself, but I forbade her."

Susan sat down, somewhat reassured. She thought it aight be only that something had gone wrong in the house-old; or perhaps the dressmaker had rained the wedding-lesses. "Tell me at once, Ursula. Do not heat about the aight."

"You say I looked angry," said Ursula. "I am angry; rith Emma. She has grown to love Charles Carnagic."

Busan turned white. She could not speak.

"Listen a moment, and you shall know as much as I do-

After you left, Charles stayed on, sleeping at the mag before. I wondered, but of course it was not my busings to send him away. He was much here; it was only nature that he should be. Then I noticed it's emed to occur to my mind all in a moment how much Emma was with him out with him in the grounds at all times and all home, as with him indoors. Well, Susan, I never attempted to ched it, for it only seemed natural, Last night Frances Maithag run in, at dusk, after their tea. I don't know what it we with you, but here it was a didl, distual evening, almost foggy. 'When do you expect Susan home ?' were her first words, without saying How d'ye do, or anything -but ye know her abrupt manner. 'Probably to-morrow,' answered. 'Well, it's time she came, that's all,' said she I have seen what I don't like. I have suspected it keen days, but I am sure of it now - that Emma is too intinate with Charles Carnagie.' Susan," added Ursuta, "you might have knocked me down with a feather; and then it all res up frightfully before me, their walking out together, and their whispering indoors."

"How did she mean that they were too intimate?" faltered Susan. "What had she seen?"

"She would not say. She said she should only tell you You had better ask her."

Susan leaned her head upon her hand. "Frances is verfanciful," was her remark, "and if once she takes an ids into her head, her imagination improves upon it."

"True. You must have it out with her, what she did see, and what she did not see. When Emma walked herself in, last night, it was almost dark; I said nothing to her. I fear she is too fond of him: it all looks like it. Of his sentiments I know nothing; but, since this occurred, I have wondered whether she was the attraction that kept him here."

How Susan bore with her anxiety until evening, when my went to the Maitlands, she scarcely knew. She drew mass aside at once. "Ursula has told me," she whispered. What was it you saw?"

**Only that she was clasped to Charles Carnagie's breast, ying and wailing, and he was kissing her."

"Oh, Frances! you surely never saw that!"

"I saw it. If it were the last word I ever spoke, I saw "impressively uttered Miss Maitland. "They were becoming their hard fate in his being bound to you. She oblied out that her happiness was gone for ever, and he that had never loved Sasan half as passionately as he loved ir. That is all I saw or heard, Susan; but that is pretty will."

"Where were they?"

"In the grove, by the large elm-tree at the turning. You mow the bench."

Susan went into the drawing-room. The scene swam isfore her eyes; she answered questions at random; and then Mr. Carnagie spoke to her, she turned faint and sick. Datwardly he was attentive to her, but it was a forced attention. In the course of the evening, when some of the sarty were in the garden, Mr. Carnagie drew Emma away rom the rest. Susan followed them; she believed it her luty; she was wretched, jealous, miserable. She saw them tanding together in an attitude of the deepest affection, and he drew away again, more jealous and more wretched than lefore.

"What shall you do?—what will be your course?" Miss Maithard asked her.

"I know not I know not," she answered, in tones of anguish. "Frances, pity me!—oh that I could fly away somewhere, from it all, and find rest!"

Frances Muitland did pity her, little as she was given to

I would have sacrificed my life for you," whispered dsan; "I must now sacrifice what is far dearer. You hist be the one to sail with him; not 1."

"Susan I you never shall sacrifice yourself for me!

"Ho more," interrupted Susan. "My resolution is taken, ad I came to tell it you. I hope that time will be merciful ome: to us both."

Susan left the room as she spoke, and there stood Ursula. "Susan, I heard you in there; I almost hoped you were cating her. We must send her away to my aunt's to-arrow recruing, until the wedding is over."

200b, Ursula," she wailed, in tones of the deepest anguish, can you not see what must be? The wedding must be ers, not mine: she must marry Mr. Carmagic."

("Give in to those two false ones!" uttered Ursula. EYou never shall with my consent."

To marry him, when his love has openly left me, might be enter on a life of repreach from him, certainly of coldness, ossibly of neglect and cruelty. Ursula, that is more than fould bear. I will have one more interview with him, and hen leave till they are gone. You must superintend what a required by Emma."

"What will the neighbours say?" wondered Ursula. And

She held her interview with Mr. Carnagic the next norning, but what took place at it was never spoken of by ither. Susan's face bore traces of many tears when she ame out, and he looked more troubled and annoyed than to had ever looked before; holding the unfortunate golding between his fingers, in a dubious way, as if he did not know what to do with it. The chaise was at the door to

) she was stopping into it, Frances Maitland came  $_{\rm B}$  down.

158

"What is all this rumour, Susan?" she deman "That you are going away, and that Emmus is to marry Carmagie? I will not have such folly. I have come to it. The country will cry shame upon her and upon! Lock her up, and keep her upon bread and water.!! have sacrificed enough for her, I think, without sacrificy your husband."

"Say no more, Frances," was her only answer, cannot bear it."

She waved her adien, and drove away with a break heart. Never to return home until long after Mr. Carag and Emma, his wife, had sailed for Barbuches.

"No luck will attend them," was the comment

CHAPTER III.

A CONSULTATION.

r was one of the first days of early spring. Two young idies stepped from their house into the garden, to see what pening flowers, what budding trees, had weathered the iting winds and frosts. They were Susan and Ursula flase. One of them was tall and stout, and she looked bout her with interest, for she loved the garden: that was Irsula; the other, a fair, quiet girl, with a subdued look of are on her face, walked more abstractedly, as if she were coupled with inward thought: this was Susan.

Ursula talked engerly, as they slowly strolled along: the rilliant sanshine had put her into spirits. Her sister enlied in monosyllables.

"How quiet and dull you are, Susan 1" she exclaimed at eight. "What is the matter?"

"Nothing," answered Susan.

"I know what it is. You are thinking of that complaining etter of Mrs. Carnagie's. You never will overcome that abit of yours, Susan, of taking little disagreeables to neart. Mrs. Carnagie writes as if she were not happy. Well, she could not expect to be happy. But that is no cason why you should sigh and look sad, and walk through his welcome sunshing as if you did not care for it, or for the promising aspect of the shrubs and flowers."

They were passing a garden-seat as Ursula spoke, and Susan sat down upon it, and touched her sister's and detain her.

"I will tell you what is troubling me, Ursula; wh cannot enjoy this spring day, or anything else just now, have been thinking, ever since that letter arrived fr Emma-----

- "From Mrs. Carnagie. Well?"
- "That one of us ought to go out to her."
- "Ought to do what?" echoed Usula, in tones of an and astonishment.
- "To go out, and be with her in her approach illness."
- "Susan, I am amazed at you-I am shocked at you uttered Ursula. "Have you forgotten har comfuct his wickedly she behaved to us-to you?"
- "But"-Susan answered in a low voice "you rememb Who it is has charged us that if our brother sin against g we shall forgive him; not once, but seventy times seven?"
- "We are not charged to give in to Mrs. Carangle fanciful caprices," peremptorily spoke Ursula, drowning k sister's voice. "That cannot have anything to do will religion,"
- "Oh yes it has, Ursula. Since her letter reached is, have been considering it in all lights, and I feel that oned us ought to go out to her."
- "You have singular notions [" exclaimed Ursula.
- "When the thought first flashed upon me, I drave it away, it may be angrily; I would not dwell upon it. But it seems determined not to be driven away; and it keeps whispering to me that it is what must be done, if we would fulfil our duty,"
- "Would it be pleasant to you, may I ask, to go and visit Charles Carnagie?
  - "No. Very unpleasant."

And I am not going. So the thing is impossible, and sed not be spoken of again."

"Could you not be induced to go?" asked Susan.

Never. Had things gone on as they ought, and you me there in her place, I could not have gone out to you, san dear, for a hot climate would kill me. Look how ill am in the heat of summer, even here. No, I will not orifice my health for Mrs. Carnagic. She is not worth

"She is our sister, Ursula."

To not let us prolong a useless discussion, Susanthing in the world should induce me to go out, so let the atter rest. Were I to see Mrs. Carmage, here or there, it ald only be to repreach her. Shall we proceed?"

Susan waved away the proposal, and remained seated.

"We must settle this natter, Ursula, but not by letting rest. I felt sure you would not go; therefore," she ided in a lower tone, "I have been making up my own find to the inevitable."

"Not to go out to Burbadoes ! "

"Yes, I have. If we let her remain to go through her hess alone, and she should die in it, as she says she fears he may, we should never cease to represent ourselves. I ever should."

"She is not going to die under it," retorted Ursula.

She was always full of fancies."

"I hope she is not. But you see by her letter how lowpirited she is; how she dreads it."

"Her conscience pricks her," said Urada. "One with a and conscience is afraid of everything."

"Dear Ursula, you will so much oblige me by never illuding in that way to the past. It is over and gone, and ight to be buried in oblivion. Surely if I have forgotten by you may do so." "You have not forgotten it, Susan."

"Quite as much as is needful and necessary. Of ecto entirely forget it as a thing that never took place, impossibility, but I have forgiven them both in my hears."

"And retain no tender remembrance of him? 1d believe you, Susan. You are not one to forget so easily.

"Yes, I am, when there is a necessity," Susan ala sternly said. "I could have been true to him for my wl life, though he must have passed it abroad, and I here those few years were passed; but from the very momen knew he did not care for me, I set to work to root h from my heart; and I have well succeeded. How car you think it was otherwise, Ursula?—and he the husba of Emma!"

"Nay, don't be put out. I did not think you we cherishing the old love—of course not; but I thought the would be sufficient of its remembrance left to prevent you running out to see them in the first year of their marriage.

Susan felt the words. Ursula was of a stern, unforgivia mature, and her remarks were often cutting.

"I am not running out to see them for my own pleasage it will be anything but pleasant to me, although he is to me now, no more than my sister's husband. I would rather traverse the whole wide earth than go to Barbadoes; but a sense of duty impels me."

"You always did think so much about 'duty,'" previshly remarked Ursula. "Your conscientiousness must be very strongly marked."

"I suppose it is—I believe it is. And there is another thing which arges me to go," added Sasan; "my love for Emma. Although she acted as she did, I cannot forget how fond I was of her; and since the arrival of this letter, when I have thought of her as ill, anxious, lonely, not (as seems) too happy, all my old love for her has come back me."

'You would go sairing out, and make yourself a slave to humours of Mrs. Carnagie, and remain there as nurse-id to her children!" cried the vexed Ursula. "In twenty is from this, we should not see you home again."

'Not so," answered Susan. "When once Emma is safely if her illness, I shall come back to you. I shall certainly remain to make my home there, in their house. But does seem so anxious for what she calls my forgiveness, I so apprehensive that she shall not live! I must go, sula."

Blow could you go? Who is to take you?"

"I can go alone. Under the charge of the captain of the p. I have thought out my plaus."

Oh I if you have made up your mind, there's nothing re to be said, for it would not turn you," resentfully oke Ursulu. "Shall you start to-day?" she ironically led.

"No," smiled Susan, "but I should like to be away by a day fortnight—should a vessel be sailing about that to. My own preparations will not take long."

"Susan, you are not in earnest 1"

Now that I have made up my mind, the sooner I am ay the better. I must be there before Emma's illness."

"That's not going to happen in a week."

"Neither can I reach Barbadoes in a week. I wish you ald see this in the light that I do, Ursula; you would not amble at me then."

It was the loving spirit of charity, of forgiveness, the surging Susan Chase to take this long journey to visit sister. A season of bitter desolution had passed over san, during which her heart had been purified to wise a better things then the daily gratification of self. Ursula had not yet found this spirit; her time for it was not con she was proud and unforgiving. Never, since her sig marriage, had she called her by her familiar Christian and always "Mrs. Carnagie;" and yet Emma had not sh against her, but against Swan, for she bad wiled away intended husband to whom Susan lead been engaged years. When Susan saw that they loved each otherthought they did-and that Mr. Carnagie had forgotten! in his new passion for her young and handsome sister, sacrificed her prospects and her love to them, as we have se gave Mr. Carnagie his release, and suffered them to man To visit them in as Ursula expressed it the first year their marriage, could not be pleasant to her; but Emmals written home a long and most heart reading letter, ever page of which implied a wish, though it was not expresse that Susan was with her to comfort and forgive her, and t take care of her in an approaching time of peril. Susa asked herself how she could refuse to go-she who ha promised their mother, on her death-bed, always to cheid

When her resolution became known, the neighbourhed troubled itself amazingly about it, neighbourhood fashion It chiefly adopted the views of Ursula. But Smain was not to be disneayed, and with as little delay as possible she started on her voyage.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PINES.

led the Pines, and was situated near the capital of Bardoes, where Mr. Carmagie's regiment was quartered. A all house for a West-Indian country house, but it was ry pretty, of gay, cheerful appearance, with a cool verandah using along the front and west side, whence a few steps seemed to the garden—a well-kept garden, full of trees, wers and tropical fruits. Marriage—frantic as they were rit—land not brought to Mr. and Mrs. Carnagie the appiness they had possibly anticipated. It may be that me fault bay on both sides; it is generally so, where ssensions take place in early-married days. Mrs. Carnagie as exacting and warm in temper, and the licutemant was ore careless to please her than he might have been.

She was sitting one evening in a sullen mood, full of ager at her husband, for he ought to have been home to inner, but had not come, and she had taken it alone. The adden darkness succeeding to the garish day, with scarcely ay twilight, and to which Mrs. Carnagie had grown accussmed, had scarcely overspread the room, when she heard or husband's horse canter up. She rose from her sofa ouched a hand-bell for lights, and prepared a loud reproact s she waited for him.

Mr. Carnugie, tall and dark as over, entered listlessly and, ere she could speak, haid a letter before her, wh remark that the packet was in.

166

- "Why did you not come home to dinner ?"
- " Chard was out, and I had to take the afternoon da was Mr. Carnagie's reply.

Mrs. Curnagic did not know whether this was true, ; felt inclined to tell him it was not. But to what us, if he would be sure to persist in the story? He had go indifferent to coming home of late, and the evensex always the same duty. She generally broke out into proaches; which were not quite the way to win back

- "You might have sent me word that you did not inte to come home," she said; " not have kept me waiting hone for dinner,"
- "That was your own fault. I have desired you never wait. An officer's time is not his own."
- "It is sufficiently his own when he chooses to make it & significantly responded Mrs. Carnagie.
  - "Why do you not open your letter, Emma ?"
- "Oh, I suppose it is like the last theore of Uranha's at epistles, calling me 'Mrs. Carmagie.' I wonder she will at all !" "This is from Susan."
- "From Susan to celoud Mrs. Carnagie, taking up th letter. "How do you know?" "It is her handwriting."
- "Yes ! of course you remember that? I am positive those letters you keep, tied up in a bundle in your desk, an that you never will let me see the outside of, were from he You love her remembrance far better than you love me now."

Mrs. Carnagie was very foolish. She did not really think this, and her husband knew she did not, but she was in a mood to get in rannaches from nothing.

I have told you they were not from Susan," he angrily L. "I burnt Susan's letters the day after I brought you here."

Vith a gesture of impatience, he went out on the verandah, stretching himself on one of the coolseats there, lighted eigar. His wife opened the newly-arrived letter, and her eyes down it.

'Charles 1 Charles 1" she exclaimed, her tone changing one of joyful eagerness. "Charles, I have such news I come here."

What is it?" he asked, re-entering.

- 'Who do you think is coming out? -to be with me in illness. Who do you think?"
- CUrsula ?"
- 'No. Susan."
- Susan 1 Coming here?"
- Susan is coming here. Oh, how kind she is ! She is her passage out now."
- "It is more than you --more than we both deserve," was a remark. "Are you sure it is Susan that is coming?"
- "She gives her reasons; and says: Show this letter to Carnagie.' She thinks it her duty to come and take to of me in my unhappiness, not only because she loves have because she remembers her promises to my mother.
- she not good, Charles?"
  "Yes," answered Mr. Carnagie; "she always was good."
  "Charles, tell me the truth—why you did not come hon dinner."
- "I have told you. Duty." And Mr. Carnagie walks to his eight again, and Emma frowned.
- Mr. Carnagic sat, and smoked, and ruminated. Taking e consideration with another, he did not know that he is glad Susan Chase was coming out. For his wife's infort in her approaching illness, he certainly was so; but he was conscious that his domestic home was very unit the one Susan must have pictured to herself, years a which owned him for its lord and master—as he was a unlike what she had then thought him; and he did i altogether care that she should come behind the scenes a see this.

Not until the last week in April did Susan reach Bard does. The passage from England had been long, the shaving met with contrary winds. A midst the confusion the arrival, people coming off from the shore, and peopleaving the vessel, Susan felt confused and auxious. See expected to see her sister or Mr. Carnagie, or both; by neither arrived to claim her.

"Suppose my letter should not have reached them!" standardly exclaimed to herself, and her checks burnt wit crimson at the thought of appearing there without warning and having to make verbal explanations for doing so. A that very moment, an exceedingly good-looking English officer, who had just come on board, approached her.

"I think I must be right," he said, with a friendly smile "that I have the honour of speaking to Miss Chase, for see a great likeness to Mrs. Carmeje."

That was through poor Susan's momentary flush. "I am Miss Chase," she replied. "Are my sister and Ma Carnagie not here?"

"Mrs. Carnagie is not well; and Mr. Carnagie requested me, last night, to come on board, if she arrived before in got back."

Susan found the gentleman speaking to her was a Captain Chard: but ere many more minutes had clapsed, Mr. Carnagie appeared. Susan's manner was calm and self-possessed: it would never be otherwise to Mr. Carnagie again. He hurried her on shore, and into the carriage.

ot giving time for any luggage whatever to accompany hom, but ordering it to be sent on.

Me How is Emum?" she inquired of Mr. Carnagie, as a carriage drove away, for really his movements had cen so hasty, there was not time to put the question efore.

-a Thank you. She has a little boy."

A little hov I" exclaimed Susan. "Since when ?"

" ()nly to-day."

"Oh I am sorry you should have left home to meet me, could have found my way to you, I make no doubt. Is no well?"

"Yes; I believe so.. Chard had sent me word that the ip was casting anchor, so I thought the best plan was to me and bring you at once to Emma."

When Susan arrived at the Pines, she had to wait before it could go into her sister's room, and Mr. Carnagie left in one of the sitting-rooms. Susan was very hot: she as sure she should not like a West Indian elimate, and sho it admiring the cool mutting, and the cool floating fans hich kept up a constant breeze, when the door opened, ad Ruth came in. The girl burst into tears when Susan took her by the hand, so delighted was she to see a home ice again. She had lived with them in England, and had icompanied Emma on her marriage.

"Rath," asked Miss Chase, " was not this a rather sudderent? I hoped to have been here for it. I understood om my sister it was not expected until May."

"That is what we all thought, Miss Susan," was the girl's aswer. "I think my mistress made herself ill."

"What do you mean, Ruth?"

"The night before last she was put out about something, ad she quarrelled with Mr. Carnagic. Quite violent she as and I believe that took effect upon her. She is a good deal altered from what she used to be, ma'am, and herself out over the least thing."

170

Mrs. Carmagic improved in health. At the end of a v Susan laughingly asked her where her presentiment of a recovery had flown to,

"It is all owing to your care and to your good music answered Emma. "Oh, Susan f you are a great deal kin to me than I deserve. Charles said so, the evening t your letter arrived. After our conduct 1992

"We will bury the past in the past," interrupted  $S_{RR}$ "It is the only request I make you."

"Well-so be it. Yet let me just tell you one thin Susan: that if I had foreseen all, you should have been t one to have him, if you would ; but not 1. If you kne how very different he is from what he appeared that most

"Emma, I entreat you, let us find some other topics discourse."

"You will not hear unything against him: I see whati is," cried the perverse invalid. "You think him an angel and everything that's good; but he is just the contag. You can't deny that you used to think him one, Susan; and of course you think so still."

Susan was pained. She did not like the charge, and ye scarcely liked to condescend to refute it. She began to think Emma more childish than ever, and suffered her to

"I don't believe he cares for me at all; not half ora quarter as much as he used to care for you. I am thankful, for your sake, Susan dear, that you did not have him. He has grown indifferent to his home, stops out, and never cares to apologize; and one day-it was about last Christmas -he frightened me nearly out of my senses. I never saw any rational boing in such a passion in my whole life; his ary was frightful. Did you know he could put himself ato these fits of passion?"

4.3

"I never saw him in one," was Susan's somewhat evasive nswer; for she remembered what Frances Maitland had nce said to her.

" Well, he can; though I believe it takes a good deal to xeite him to it. Never marry a passionate man, Susan."

"Do you never lose your temper, yourself, and fall into a assion?" asked Susan, in a half-joking manner.

ol? If I do lose my temper I have good cause," reurned Mrs. Carnagie. "There are some things one cannot nd ought not to put up with : even you, Susan, patient as on are, would not do so."

- "Whatever they may be, ill-temper will not mend them," eplied Susan. "A pleasant spirit, one with the other, yould soothe the rubs and crosses of life, and render you oth so much luppier. Besides, as your little child grows ip, what an example unger and discourtesy would be to set before him."
- "You are not aware what lives some of these officers lead out here, especially the single ones. They make what they all left-hunded marriages. Hardly one but has done so."

" Left-hunded marriages 1" echoed Susan, puzzled

"Who with ?"

"With the Creoles, chiefly. Some of these false wive are as white as we are, some darker, some black—fastidiou lastes, they must have, certain of these officers! Charle was one of them."

"Oh no 1" involuntarily uttered Susan.

"Oh no, you say ! You think him better than others do you? He is worse than others. All those years whe you deemed him so constant, he was playing truant to yo with that Greole wife. Wife! Now do you think I coul bear that, and put up with it tamely? When I heard, aft I came out, what had been going on, I felt inclined to make a come back to him."

"But," cried Susan, her mind rebelling at being as the receptacle of such news, "if I understand you right this happened years ago."

"What if it did? the traces remain. There are to little dark wretches, and his money going out to appear them. And, for all I know, he still - ..."

"My dear sister," hastily interrupted Susan, "it seems to me that you are looking at things in a wrong light, You are his true wife, and therefore a "."

"Are you going to defend him? to defend such system?" angrify cried Mrs. Carnagie.

"You know better. I think it very bad, though Ide not wish to speak of it. But, all that had happened, has happened before you were soything to him, and you never ought to have suffered it to pass your lips in speaking with him. It was not your affair, or one you had any business with. Never speak of it again, Ennua; banish it from your memory. He is your husband now, your lawful husband; be to him a kind and affectionate wife, and if he is not yet (though I should hope he is) quite all he ought to be, he will become so in time. It rests with you."

"You had a lucky escape, Susan," persisted Mrs. Carnagic "Funcy what it was, almost as soon as I landed, to be told that he had been as good as married before! What would you have said, had such news greeted you?"

"I should have said -whatever I may have felt that it was no friend to me who could impart such news. Who told you, Emma?"

"Major Jacobson's wife. Her husband is on half-pay, and holds some civil post out here. She has lived on the island for years, and knows the ins and outs of all the officers' affairs, however many may be quartered here. She ske of it quite as a matter of course; as one might speak changing a servant. Charles found, though, that I did t take it as a matter of course. We have never been rdial since."

"And is it this which has created the unhappiness, the ssension you speak of, between you and your husmd 2 11

That is the chief thing. That was the first and great ase; but I have found out plenty of faults to reproach m with, since. Not, perhaps, of the same nature : I don't ly that."

"You have looked out for faults, I fear," said Susan.

"To be sure I have. Things that I might never have hought of, or should have passed over lightly; but I felt ay heart completely turn against him. I should not care The died to-morrow."

"Oh, Emmat" cried Susan, in anguished tones, "how an I hope to bring you to your senses? --- to a just view of your duty to your husband? Whatever laid taken place in he past was at an end. I cannot think otherwise, and it ms your duty and interest so to regard it. In visiting this pon Mr. Carmagie in repronches, in perverseness of temper, fou, his wife, were laying a train of misery for your whole uture life."

"Of course ! Charles is right, and I am wrong. He did right, then, and the other officers do right, and Miss Chase has turned champion for them ! I wish I had never writte you how unhappy I was! I might have known if yo came out it would not be to sympathize with my wrongs but to defend Lieutenant Carnagie. Let my pillow alone Susan; it does not want fidgeting with."

The tears filled Susan's eyes, and she almost wished then, that she had listened to Ursula, and left Mr. and Mr. Carragie to themselves. How should she succeed in bringin her sister into a better frame of m(n) and temper?  $\mathbb{Q}_{\emptyset}$  she over succeed ?

If she did it would be a miracle. Any one but Susu, persevering and patient, would have deemed the tag hopeless one. Emma Chase by nature was obstinate, of willed, fractions, and inordinately vain; but as Emma Chase, shielded in her own house, conded by wise fried little scope had been afforded for their display. She has been indulged and petted, her vanity was fostered, and has whins wore given way to, and even Susan had not know how very little good there was in her. But as Mrs. Carnaga all the ill, and worse than all, was displayed.

The little child died. Mr. Carmagic evidently mouraed deeply; and Emma, for a whole week, went into incessal bursts of tears. Had they been wise, had Emma been alie to her own true interest, they might have been reconciled to each other then, have buried grievances, and had the foundation for a happy and peaceful life. Somehow it was not done; and Susan was afraid almost to breathe to herself her conviction that the fault was Emma'n, less she might be accused of partiality for Mr. Carnagie.

CHAPTER V.

AT CHOSS PURPOSES.

Trums came, and Susan Chase was still at Barbadoes. ie had not dured to leave Emun, for a new fear for her id begun to spring up her extreme guiety of conduct. It true there was not much scope for joining in worldly ausement where they were situated, but however little or such might be going on, Mrs. Carnagic was certain to be it. And, what was most especially distasteful to Susan, 16 was invariably surrounded by officers, laughing with ion and listening to their reckless nonsense. Riding in he cool of the morning, surrounded by redcoats at luncheon, ninging in the afternoon bazaar at Bridgetown, dressed-out t parties in the evening; in any and all of these might be con Mrs. Carnagie, flirting with all who would flirt with Her husband remonstrated, not against the flirting; e would not, in his pride, put it upon that score, but against he expense. His income was good, but not extravagant, ad Mrs. Carnagie was falling into extravagant habits. The uncheons she would cause to be set out, and the evening intertainments she would give were profusely expensive. Mr. Carnagic might as well have remonstrated to the moon, or she paid not the least attention to him. Susan was misorable, and Emma laughed at her.

One day Mr. Carnagic came in, looking jaded and tired. It was the hour for dinner, but Mrs. Carnagic was off on some expedition, and did not seem to be remembering Susan was sitting with her work in the verandali, an came and stood by her. They had lapsed, from the quite into their relative positions or brother and siste law, and former days had never been afinded to bet them; not a frace or recollection of what had been see to be retained by either.

"Where's Emma?" asked Mr. Carnacie,

"She went out after binchests. I thought she probably gone to the town, and that you would come b with her. She may have gone nero s to Mor. Jacobson's have stayed there,  $gossiping\ ^{o}$

Mr. Carnagie hegan to whistle. Prevently he spoke aga and looked impatiently at his watch.

"I want my dinner. It is ten minutes past the hour,"

"I hope she will not be long," was all the comfort po Susan could give.

al think I shall take to dining out there," he continue nodding his head in the direction of the town.

"At the mess?" remarked Sugar, we hing her siste would come in.

"At any rate, on busy days. Chard has got leave for home at last and sails by the most packet which will be here in a day or so. I shall have more to do when he is gone,"

"I knew he had obtained it," answered Finan.

"Yes, I imagine you did," said Mr. Carangie, "And that you are the moving motive," he added, looking at her with a meaning smile, of joked Chard about it today, coming off parade, and he turned as red as his coat; I thought the sourlet would never go down. Those fair men do show their blushes, if they have got any." Sus in did not understand.

"What did you joke him about?" she inquired.

Now, Susan! how prettily innocent you appear. There to occasion to make a mystery of it to me, for I know nit it from Emma."

(About what, Mr. Carnagie? I am making no mystery." (Why-if you will have me say it-you know Chard has leave for home, you acknowledge that."

Yes, I know that,"

'And you know, I presume, that he has been pretty istant in his attendance here?"

"Yes," faltered Susan, not quite so readily as at the other estion.

Mr. Carnagia smiled. "For once that any other officer s come here," he continued, " and some of them have not m slack in their attentions, Chard has come ten times. ) would not do this without a powerful motive,"

Susan said nothing. What was Mr. Carnagic driving at ? CAnd as he has made it all right with a certain young ly, I expect she will be going by the next packet, and me back with him as Mrs. Chard. You see I am au want, Susan,"

Susan stared at Mr. Carnagie, and ran over in her mind g few available young badies of all who visited at the Pines. e could fix on none.

"What young lady is it?" she resumed.

Oh, Susan t to pretend ignorance, and usk me that? m used to be superior to coquetry. But possibly you ink I have forfeited all right to be the depository of your ve-secrets ? "

It was the first time he had ever alluded in any way to o past, and Susan felt her face flush a little. ion she spoke, it was with cold, pointed calmuess.

"I really am ignorant what you are alluding to, Mr. rnagio; if I were not, I would not pretend to be so. I we not heard that Cuptain Chard was likely to marry."

He rose up in astonishment, and stood before "Susan1"

- "What? What do you mean?"
- "It is you that Chard is going to marry ! Nobodyels "Mo!" uttered Susan. "Who could have told
- that?"
- "Emma, herself. I asked her, one day, what on a brought Chard dancing up here everhistingly, and she it was after you. That things were settled, or on the p of being settled, between you."

Susan Chase gathered in the meaning of the words gathered in the full meaning of other words and action that had loomed unpleasingly upon her for some time and she turned sick with a defined fear, and her face lips grow as white as the work she was engaged on.

"I see I have startled you, Smsan," said Mr. Cama "I did not mean to hurt or vex you, and if you object my knowing it, I am sorry Emma should have told me!

Susan opened her lips to assure Mr. Carmagio that Cap Chard was not, and never had been, anything to her; stern thoughts came sternly over her, and she stop herself in time. At that moment her sister's cari appeared in sight, and she raised her hand to point it to Mr. Carnagie.

"Yes! I wonder where she has been? Now we can be dinner. Touch the hand-hell, will you, Susan, and them to be quick in serving it. Susan, I am sorry I ve you."

"Thank you, Mr. Carmgie, you did not vex me. It only-only very much surprised," was Susan's answer.

Mr. Carnagic leisurely descended the steps, to be readiness to help his wife from the carriage, and Supressed her forehead upon the railing of the venue her head aching and her heart sick.

Why should Mrs. Carnagie have told her husband that Captain Chard's attraction there was herself? It was a barefaced untruth. Captain Chard had not paid her any attention whatever. Excepting—it came now into her brain like a flush of light, and the indignant crimson ame to her brow with it—excepting when Mr. Carnagie had been at home. Then he had been attentive to her, not Susan in her indifference to Captain Chard had not aken notice of it. A frightful suspicion of what Emma's notive might have been—of what it must have been—came paring her heart, and Susan Chase wrung her hands in lespair and tribulation.

"I am sorry I kept you waiting," Mrs. Carnagie had the mace to say. "I called in at the Lettsoms', and they letained me."

"At the Lettsoms' 1" repeated Mr. Carnagie. "Have on been into the town ?"

"All the afternoon, at one place or another. Susan, you tok tired."

"It's old I should not have seen the carriage. I wish I ad seen it, I should have been glad to come home in it astead of riding, for my head aches frightfully and the un did it no good. Have you any one coming here o-night?"

"No, unless Captain Chard should drop in. He said erhaps he might do so. I met him."

"Because I shall go to hed," said Mr. Carnagie.

"What is that for ?" asked his wife.

"If my head is to aplit, as it is splitting now, I can't sit p. It is as if I were going to have the fever."

Susan raised her eyes. Mr. Chringie did look ill, his face of and his cyclids heavy. And though he had complained franting his dinner, she saw he was playing with it more han cating it.

- "How does the fever come on ?" she inquired.
- "We have more sorts of fever than one, Susan," answered. "Sometimes the fellow will be langing aby you for a fortnight, and you are languid and miseral and cannot tell what's the matter with you until it has out. But the worst fever comes on without warning alm like a sunstroke, and it often does its work."
  - "Kills you, do you mean?" returned Susan.

Mr. Carnagio nodded, haid down his knife and fork, a when the cloth was removed, rose and said he she go at once to bed. Mrs. Carnagie followed him upstai though whether she went to his room with him Susani not know. Captain Chard came in later, and he was toolly visitor they had that night.

- "What is the matter with Carnagie ?" he inquired,
- "Only a headache," said Mrs. Carnagie, "it was throughing about in the sun. He began talking to Susan abofever, frightening her, I think."
- "No," interposed Susan, quiet'y, "he did not fright me. I think he looked ill."

Between nine and ten, Susan went upstairs for some lashe wanted for her work, leaving ther sister and Capta Chard playing cribbage. When she returned, both had be the room. She looked in the other sitting-room, which was also lighted up, but they were not there.

Susan stepped on to the verandah, to the dark corner cit, and stood there, leaning over the front railings, as looking out. She thought she felt a dampness in the as and knew it was not well to stand in it, but her heart we too busy with anxious thoughts to be over-cautious the night. It was bright moonlight, and presently her excaught what she thought was the white dress of her side in one of the side-walks. Yes it was; she and Captair Chard were walking arm-in-arm; now stopping as if the alk, and now slowly pacing on; only occasionally could lasan see them, as they moved amidst the trees.

Her heart bent violently; what ought she to do? Setting uside all the fears which had come to her that wening, she felt that it was not seemly for Mrs. Carnagie to be wandering about by moonlight with a young officer—that she herself could not do it, were she a wife. Suppose she went and called to her, how would it look? What would Captain Churd think of her interference? At least wenty minutes did she stop there deliberating, and then he descended the steps, and sped along the broad drive, alling to her sister when she came to the side-walk. They both advanced towards her.

"Emmu, I wished to remind you how damp it is. Do you not feel it? I am sure you ought not to walk in it 5-night."

"Ob, it's nothing," was Mrs. Carnagie's reply; "you hould feel some of our nights here."

"I think you had better come in."

"Yes, I will follow you directly:"

Susan could not well linger after this, and she returned adoors, with a heavy step and a heavier heart. A yawning fulf seemed stretched out before her, waiting for some-jody's feet to fall into it. She wished it was her own—if that might save her sister. After Captain Chard's return from his leave of absence, she, Susan, would not be here; Emma would then be alone. If she renewed this absurfatimacy with him, what might not be the result? Mrs Carnagie soon came running in. Captain Chard had gone.

"Emma" Susan stopped. She sat down on an ottoman, and almost gasped for breath; twenty sentences rose to her lips, and none seemed appropriate. "Emma, you are too much with Captain Chard," she uttered at aMrs. Carnagie took the words with great coolness, Mr. Carnagie been helping you to that opinion?"

"For shame, Emma ! No But you have been wife blinding him. You have told him that Captain Char object in coming here so much was to see me,"

"Did he tell you that?"

"Yes-believing it. I did not undeceive him then thought I must speak to you first. Farma, if you do 1 alter your plan of conduct, you will be lost,"

"Thank you for warning me," replied Mrs. Carnag with a mocking smile.

"Oh, Emma!" eried Susan, imploringly raising h hands, "have you forgotten that you are your mother daughter - our sister the wife of Charles Carnagio You must alter. You cannot intend to to disgraher memory, to bring shame upon us, and him I"

"Why, Susan, what has taken you to-night? think you have caught the fever we spoke of. Who say I am going to disgrace you?"

"You will inevitably lose your good name if you go of as you have latterly been doing, hipsing into familiarity with other men and deceiving your husband; you will deserve to lose it. Halt on your course whilst you are safe, and whilst you hold your husband's good opinion nd the world's favour. Emma! if you would but turn Mr. Carnagie with affection, he would turn to you."

"I will not turn to him," she passionately interrupted; "for the love I once bore him has changed to hatred. Do not look at me like that; I tell you it has ! I hate Charles

She snatched up a light as she spoke, and left the room. Susan was vory unhappy, and lay awake half the night. On the following morning Mr. Carnagie was no better, but he dressed and went into the town. Busan asked hother that was prindent. Oh, there was nothing like artion to shake off a touch of the fever, was his reply, d it was the last day of Chard's stay.

Captain Chard rode up in the course of the day to take ive and Mrs. Caringie came down to receive him, but a had not previously joined her sister, afraid, Susan prosed, of a recurrence of the last night's topic. They and alone, Susan and her sister, Mr. Carnagie having id he should not be home for it; only monosyllables issed between them. Afterwards, Susan was surprised at sing the carriage brought round, and Emma came down in silk evening dress. There was a party at the Lettsoms'. "Are you going out this evening?" she exclaimed, nable to prevent a slude of repronch in her tone. "Supose your husband should come home ill-he seemed very awell this morning."

"Ill! when he has been in the town all day! He is sking himself comfortable at the mess, that is what he idoing. Good-bye, Susan."

As Susan stood in the verandah, she saw Ruth take down er mistress's bonnet and cleak, and place them in the arriage. What was that for? Could Emma be going to cturn home on foot? She leaned forward and asked her. lo, was Mrs. Carnagie's unswer, she was to return in Mrs.

facobson's carriage.

Mr. Carnagic arrived soon after her departure, in a hired onveyance. He was much worse, but thought it was only brough pelting about in the heat. He asked where Emma rus, would not have a doctor fetched, but went to his hamber. In the morning, just before the hour for rising, me of the black women came to Susan's room and said Mr. Carnagio was in a raging fever.

Susan started up in alarm. Was Mrs. Carnagic with him 2 On which room was she in ?

Mrs. Carnagic had not come home, was the serva unswer.

" How shameful!" murmured Susan, as she hastily dres herself; " and her husband in this state [ 9

She sent off for the doctor, and then went to Rut apartment. Ruth was not in it. The bed had not be slept in. Susan was bewildered.

Mr. Carnagie was indeed in a raging fever, and cally aloud in his delirinin. His wife must be got there instant Susan asked Jieko, as the black man who drove was usual called, what his mistress had said to him - whether he though she might be still at the Lettsoma', or alcoping at Mr Jucobson's,

Jicko had no idea upon the point. Poor Jicko hi planter's house, would have been flogged every day to stupidity. So Jicko and the carriage were despatched in both places. He came back and said Mrs. Carangie wa

Susan could make out nothing, and thought the shortes plan would be to go herself, and bring back. Emma with his She entered the carriage, and told Jicko to drive to Mr.

As they were going along, one of the officers, who was riding home from early duty, came cantering up to the

"How is Carnagie?" he asked, taking off his late. "Has the fever laid hold of him? We feared it had, when we sent him home last night."

"I fear so," replied Susan. "He is delirious."

"All !-we thought that would be it. It is very me fortunate that Mrs. Carnagie should have been called to England just now-should have had to leave him at the "Called to England !" faltered Swan.

"I was on the ship last night with Chard, when she and ler maid came on board. It is lucky, however, that Chard should be going; he will take care of her over. They have ad a nice time for getting off; the captain sailed with laylight. Does your sister make a long stay, Miss Chase?" Susan never knew what she answered. In another minute here was a vision of a young officer recovering his head, and riding off, while she was left sick and speechess, in he carriage. She had presence of mind to order it to be arned home again, and she fell back in it in utter agony. What a situation it was for her! Left alone in Mr. Jarnagie's house; he in the delirinm of a dangerous fever, and her sister, his wife, sailed for England with Captain thard!

CHAPTER VI

MR. DEHOESTER.

In the early morning, Jicko, in obedience to Susan's orders, turned the carriage round, which had been on its way to Bridgetown, whipped up his horses, and soon drove into the grounds of the pretty country residence.

Susan descended from the carriage, and entered the house. She passed into one of the sitting rooms, closed the door, and sank down on the sofa; if ever tribulation was expressed on a human countenance, it was on hers.

"To bring herself to shome I" she wailed -" to quit her husband's home claudestinely, and depart with another, over the wide seas to enter deliberately on a wrong course !--to desert him on what may be his hed of death! And to leave me here unprotected in his house, where I ought not to be ! Oh that I had known Emma better, and never come out to her !"

Susan Chase suddenly stayed her words and held her breath. A gentlemanly voice was accosting the coachman, who, like all his native fraternity, was taking his own time ere he drove off to the stables, and the conversation ascended to her ears through the open window.

"Have you brought back your mistress, Jicko ?"

"No," cried Jicko. "Misses not unywhere. gone to England in ship."

"Nonsense, Jicko 1 You are inventing."

"Ask missee," responded Jieko. "She know."

The gentleman turned from Jicko and entered the liting-room. He was one of the clerical staff at Barbaloes, and had recently been appointed to a church there; reviously to that he had acted as an assistant or misjonary, though in holy orders. He was about thirty years of age, with a propossessing, intellectual countenance. His name was Leicester.

"You have not found Mrs. Carnagie, Miss Chase?" he hid to Susan.

What answer was Susan to give? This gentleman had igen present when she departed, half an hour before, in earch of her sister, had closed the carriage door for her, and agreed with her in assuming that Mrs. Carnagic had lept at the friend's house, where she had gone to an evening party the previous night. To confirm the news hat her sister had departed clandestinely for England, was to betray all: yet how keep the tidings from him? Contised words rose to her lips, but one contradicted another; and bewildered, terrified and helpless, she burst into an systerical flood of tears.

A suspicion of the truth arose in the mind of Mr. Leicester. For he had been a frequent visitor, and had abserved, with disapprobation, certain points in the recent conduct of Mrs. Chrongie. Susan sobbed like a child. It was not often she could be aroused to such emotion, but when it did come, it was uncontrollable.

"Strive for composure," whispered Mr. Leicester. "I fear you are in some strait, some deep distress, apart from the anxiety caused by the illness of Mr. Carnagie. You want a friend: my calling has led me amidst suffering a sorrow of all kinds: dear Miss Chase, let me be the friend."

"Oh that I had a friend!" answered Susan. "I indeed in a strait; and I know not where to turn to advice or help."

"Turn to me: tell me all that is causing you go Believe me, I have laid so much experience in the var tribulations of life, that I am old in them beyond wmy years may seem to justify. All that the truest comthe deepest sympathy can do for you, I will do."

Susan listened. An advicer she must have; left to he solf, she should sink under the weight of care that upon her; and in all Barbalous there was not one a would rather confide in than in this kind, consciently clergyman; no, not in any even double his age. Yet a still shrank from speaking, and she turned her aching less away from the light.

"I heard from Jicko that Mrs. Carnagic has departe for England, and I infer that you and her insband we left in ignorance of her intention," he reanned, in by tones, anxions to invite confidence by showing that k was not unprepared for it. "May I tell you, Miss Class, that I have almost forseen this? may I also tell you that I remonstrated privately with Mrs. Carnagic not a week ago, and entreated her to be more with her husband, and less with Captain Chard?"

So ! he knew it all. The crimson flush came into Susar-cheeks, but she dried tears.

"Oh, Mr. Leicester, she may not have gone away will him-in the worst sense of the term. Things between he and her husband have not been pleasant, especially on my sister's side. She has grown to dislike him; she told mo so; and she is headstrong and self-willed. She may have departed to separate herself from Mr. Carmagic, without-without anything worse."

Mr. Leicester could not adopt this unusual view of such case, but he did not press his own. "How did you come acquainted with her departure?" he impaired.

As I was going along, one of the officers rode up to e carriage to ask after Mr. Carnagie, and remarked how ifortunate it was the fever should have attacked him just hen Mrs. Carnagie was called to England. He said lie as on the ship last night when she and her maid came a board."

"Which of them was it?"

"Lieutenant Grape. He also observed that it was lucky liptain Chard Imprened to be going in the same vessel, as a could protect her," added Susan, engerly. "Therefore suspects nothing maiss."

"Does Mr. Curnagie suspect it?"

"Oh no. When he came home last night, ill, he asked or Emma, but she had gone out then. How distressing hat the fever should have come on so rapidly."

"It has not come on rapidly," returned the clergyman. I was sure it was attacking him, yesterday morning, and iold him so."

"You have had more experience than I, in these West Indian maladies, Mr. Leicester-indeed, I have had none at all: do you judge him to be dangerously ill?"

"I do fear so."

"This step of my sister's has placed me in an inconvenien. position," she resumed, without raising her eyes. awkward for me to be here alone."

"Yes, it is. You had better come to us, Miss Chase. Mrs. Freeman will do all she can to make you feel at home."

Susan reflected, hesitated, reflected again, and then spoke. "I would most willingly and thankfully come, but do you deem that I should be acting rightly in leaving the house at this moment-in leaving Mr. Carnagic entirely to servants ? "

"Of course your care and supervision would be a more than all they can do. Your remaining here would "Then I will remain," said Susan. "It seems to duty thrown in my way, and I will not shrink from As soon as he shall be out of danger, if you and your si will receive me until I can make arrangements for departure to Europe, I shall be thankful."

"You are not afraid of remaining in the house-afr of the fever ?"

"I have no fear on that score," returned Susan,

"I thought that was why you apolyc,"

"Oh no. I thought I thought whether any ill-natur remarks might be made at my being here alone."

"Certainly not; oh, certainly not," said Mr. Leiesk "You are closely related to Mr. Carnagie: his wife's on True. But Susan knew that Mr. Leicenter was not awa how ardently she and Charles Carmagie had once bed attached to each other; how they had been engaged to years. There lay the chief reason for the inexpediency of the measure. Not inexpedient in itself: Susan was seeme in her own self-reliance : but, those at home who had been acquainted with the engagement might say his house was not the place for her now.

"I am not learned in these points of ctiquette," resumd Mr. Loicester, perceiving that Susan still looked doubtel. "If you think it would be letter, I am sure my sister will willingly come here and stay with you until you can

"Oh, how pleased I should be I" uttered Susan, with animation; "that would put an end to all difficulties. Do you think she would really come? Would she not fear the "She would not fear that, for she had it a year ago. I will promise that she shall be with you before the day is over."

"What should I have done without you?" exclaimed

Susan, in the fulness of her gratitude.

The elergyman rose to leave. "I hope to be more useful to you yet."

"Stay an instant, Mr. Leicester. Will it be possible," she added, lowering her voice, "for us to favour Mr. Grape's supposition that my sister has really been called to England? You know a ship did come in, that day, with letters. It will be an untruth; but in such a case may it not be justifiable—in charity and in mercy? She may not, after all, have gone there wrongly: excepting inasmuch as that she has left her husband's home."

"You still cling to that idea," he observed. "Well, I do not see why it should not be favoured. If the impression is abroad that she has gone legitimately, it will only be for you to leave it uncontradicted."

"You will not hint to the contrary?" breathed Susan.

He looked at her reproachfully. "No, Miss Chase. But there are the servants here."

" I will manage that."

"And there will be her husband, when he is better."

"Yes," said Susan, inwardly shivering. "We cannot tell what his belief his course—may be. But he may no live."

Mr. Leicester quitted the house, thoroughly convinced to what Mr. Carnagie's belief would be, though he might not be so certain as to his course.

The promised friend came without delay: Mrs. Freeman. She was a young, lively widow, very much given to talking. She openly lamented, and that ten times over in the course of the first day, the inopportune summons to England of

Mrs. Carnagie. Mr. Leicester had kept faith, even her, and Susan's heart thanked him.

- "My dear, I admire you," she cried to Susan. "Ma young lady, situated as you were, would have flown off Mrs. Carnagio, and left the poor man to the mercy of fover, and the natives, who are just as stupid and tires as so many animals. It was exceedingly good and pr worthy of you to brave the infection which, truth to is fonder of flying to fresh Europeans, like you, than to acclimatized ones - and to brave the chatter of the gos mongors,"
  - "You think they will chatter ?" eried Separa
- "I think they mights sfor you and Mr. Carnogic are b young-had you not hit upon the plan of having some ( in the house as chaperon. Of course they can't now, 1 brother could not understand that they would, in any eas but his head's buried in his duties, like an ostcich's in t sand, and he judges people and motives in accordance wi his clerical tenets. I know the set out here; it is whispe ing and scandal amongst them from morning till nigh That Mrs. Jacobson's the worst, and she is your sister dearest friend. Is she going to make a long slay i England?"

"I am very grateful to you for coming," said Susan avoiding the question.

"Not at all, my dear. If we did not help each other is this world, where should we be when we come to answer for "You are sure you do not fear the fever?"

"Not I. I had it last autumn, and it will not pay mea visit again. They were saying at Mrs. Lattronn's, last night, that Mr. Carnagie was surely in for it."

Susan lifted up her head with interest, " Were you at Mrs. Lettsom's ?"

Yes. It is not often I attend evening parties, but Mrs. asom promised me some good music."

lusan longed to put a question—if she dared. How dd she frame it? She wanted to know whether Emma I appeared there at all.

Did-was this voyage of my sister's spoken of ?" slic-1, at length.

'Not at first. None of them knew of it: at least, so I bred. Mrs. Lettsom was openly wondering what had one of her, as she had promised to be there. Towards end of the evening morning it was by that time—when were breaking up, a note came in from Mrs. Carnagie, lag she had been summoned to England on urgent busis, and had been too busy with her preparations to send an lier apology."

Jany people called that day and the succeeding ones, to-They were, for the nire after Lieutenant Carangie. it part, content with driving up to the door and driving y from it; only a few entered, probably "old seediized ones," as Mrs. Freeman expressed it, who did not the fever. There was a difference of opinion in Barbas, even amongst medical men, whether it was infectious, whether it was not so; many held that it was not so, ugh it frequently became epidemic. Mrs. Freeman saw visitors in place of Susan; and she unconsciously (withhaving an idea that the facts would not have borne her ) helped to keep up the assumption that Mrs. Carnagie gone to England on business. Susan might possibly e betrayed herself, for she was a bad dissembler, but she too inwardly miserable to see any one, and she had her ase in attending upon Lieutenant Carnagie.

It was very ill. For four days Susan and the head ant (a native woman, who had grown-up children of own) searcely left his chamber. At the end of that time the fever abated, and he grew conscious. The day, he lay in a half-stupor, his eyes only open at inte the sixth, he was decidedly better ; and, though he se spoke, seemed to watch what was going on.

Towards the evening of this day, Brillianna (they themselves such fine names, those poor natives!) had from the room, and Susan was alone. She was sitting the bed, half seleop, for an unusual sensation of drow and languor was over her, when she was startled by invalid's putting out one hand and taking hold of which happened to be resting on the hed. It shook trembled with weakness. Susan, in her compassion not withdraw hers, but leaned over him.

"You are better, Mr. Carnagie, We are all thankful,"

"How long have I lain here?" he murmined.

"To-morrow will be the seventh day."

"I suppose I have been in danger?"

"Oh yes; but that is over now. Quite over."

"Where's Emma?"

The question turned Susan sick. WHAT WAS She Ruswer 2

"Since I regained consciousness, I have been looking) her, but I have never seen her. All this day I have be waiting, and keeping awake on purpose, but she has a

"Sho-has-gone from home for a little while," state mored Susan. It was the best excuse that arose to her.

He raised his head with a start, but it fell backage and both his hands clasped over Susan's, from, as it seem "Susand In she ill? She has not caught it, and di in it ? ?.

"No, indeed," returned Susan, in carnest accents," what is the matter with you?"

Nothing," answered Susan. "Only I feel sleepy, and my ad aches. It has been hot and heavy all the afternoon." I do not wish to alarm you unnecessarily, but it looks at like the fever coming on."

Oh, not here !" uttered Susan, growing nervous at the ar presented to her. "I should not like to be haid up in a Carnagie's house."

I declare you have its very symptoms. I hope it may to be so. I will remain with you, should it prove so; be sured of that."

But to be ill in this house!" persisted poor Susan, iping upon the, to her, most unsatisfactory point in the beauty. "Could I not be removed to yours?"

"If you particularly wish it. But our house is not so althily situated or so roomy as this. We shall see how in are to-morrow."

But when the morrow came it was too late to remove san Chase. The fever had come on with a vengeance. Is probable that her harassed state of mind contributed increase the delirium.

"Two invalids on my hands!" ejaculated Mrs. Freeman. Well, I must prove myself equal to it. The danger is st with Mr. Carnagie, so I will turn him over to one of so others, and Brillianua shall transfer her nursing to liss Chase. She's as obstinate as a mule, in temper, that oman, but she's a famous nurse. As to myself, I'll divide y supervision into three parts; two to be given to Susan hase, and one to Mr. Carnagie."

When Mrs. Freeman could spare a moment from Susan, is went to pay her first visit that morning to Mr. Carnagie. There is no need to ask how you are," was her salutation him. "You look as brisk as possible; very different om what you looked three days ago."

- "Yes, I am all right again. Brillianna says Susan is
- "She has taken the fever,"
- "I am vexed to hear it. Is there a fear of delir coming on ?"
- "It is on already, Ranging. New constitutions knocked down soon. But there is one consolution, Carnagie; it will be the sooner spent. The fiercer storm, the quicker it's over. I do not fear but that will get through it,"
- " Of course her sister will come home to nurse by emphatically attered Mr. Carnavie,
  - "Who, come home ?"
- " My wife. If she kept aloof from me, she cannot to from Susan "
  - "How can she come home?" cried Mrs. Freeman, at
- "How can she stay away?" retoried Mr. Carmig " Her own sister, who came out purposely to take care her in her illness I she cannot let her lie and die -as it m be-amidst strangers, and not come near her. Have y sent to inform Mrs. Carringie?"

Mrs. Freeman did not reply. Her private opinion, ju then, was, that Lieutenant Carnagie's delirium had con back to him. She never supposed he could be ignorant ( his wife's voyage,

"Where is it that my wife is staying?" he resume "I asked Susan yesterday, but she did not may. Only Mrs. Jacobson's, I suppose,"

"Well," remarked Mrs. Freeman, "this is the first lim I ever knew that the fever obliterates the recollection a previous events. It will be a new point for the considers tion of the doctors. Have you quite forgotten that Mr. Carnagie sailed for Europe ? "

Mr. Carnagic by and looked at her. " Mrs. Carmagic ba not sailed," eyes, she has. That is why I am staying here with Miss lass. It would have been a cruel thing to leave her in mrhouse without a protector, and you perhaps dying."

Mr. Carnagie was weak and ill, and he began to wonder better his memory had played him false, as Mrs. Freemannered. He carried his thoughts back to the past. All wait.

"I have no recollection," he said: "I do not comprehend all what you are saying."

Dear me! I hope it will return to you as you grow monger! Your wife started for England by the last acket; it sailed the very morning that your delirium came. Rath went with her; and Captain Chard sailed by the me vessel, and is taking charge of her on the voyage, on't you remember now?"

At that moment Brillianna put in her head, and beckened is. Freeman from the room. It was well that it was so; herwise, that lady might have obtained a curious clucidate of matters. Mr. Carnagic had time to digest the news, if to form his own opinion upon it. Whether an explosion angry passion, or any other emotion, was given way to, mot be told; he was alone; but the next time his medical tendant came to visit him, he insisted that something ast have thrown Mr. Carnagie back, for he was worse jain. Not a word said Mr. Carnagie.

CHAPTER VII.

THE END OF AN HARSTARRED VISIT.

Mas. Freeman's theory of "the tiercer the storm, if quicker it's over," whether right or wrong, in a gener sonse, certainly appeared to apply to the illness of Sas Chase. The turning-point in her malady soon came, an then she progressed rapidly towards recovery. One daufter she was about again, she was sitting in an easy-chain at the open window of the drawing-room, when Mr. Carnagicatic in. Mrs. Freeman had gone for an hour or two ther own home.

"Well, Susan," he said, "I am telerably strong again considering what the pull has been. Where's Emma? You said I was to know when I got well again."

Susan's face became livid. She was still weak, and the question terrified her. This was the moment she had a dreaded.

Mr. Carnagie drew forward a chair and sat down har. "Shall I tell you, or will you tell me2" he sail in a marked manner.

Some words escaped from Susan's white lips; something to the effect of "did he know where she was?"

"I do. Was it not a fine recompense?" he continued with suppressed passion. "We will say nothing of me her husband, but of you. To bring you out, and then to throw you off in a strange place, without proper protectors parated from your home and friends by the wide seast. bandoned, shanneless woman ! Did you know of her flight o evening she left?"

"Oh no," answered Susan, who was trembling excessively. II had, it should have been prevented; by foreible means, dentreaties failed. What shall you do?"

There is only one course open to me." "Need you ask? "And that?"

"Shoot Chard, and get a divorce."

"Oh, Mr. Carnagie t" she exclaimed in startled, wailing "Do nothing in precipitation. It may not be so id as it appears. She may have gone away only to sepato herself from you, without any-any other intentions. othing suspicious, as to her voyage, has transpired here : is universally looked upon as an innocent step. I do not ish to judge between you and Emma, but you must be ware that there was much ill-feeling between you."

"Say on her side, if you please," was his reply. add have been little on mine, but for her own temper id conduct. From the first hour that I brought her out he gave me nothing but repronches and cold looks; and or no earthly reason,"

"Sho-she-some injudicious people told her tales to our former prejudice," stammered Susan, always a peacemaker, and anxious to offer what excuse she might for her

"Psha!" augrily retorted Mr. Carnagie, "No matter what she heard to my prejudice, as to when I was a single man, it could not affect me as a married one or her either. Had she hourd that I had fired Bridgetown, and boiled down the natives for soup, it was no business of hers. I brought her out here, Busan, to do my duty by her, to be a good husband, as a true-hearted man should be, and the was a fool, and something worse than a fool, to rake up; my old scores against me. You would not be done it."

That was very true. But Sus in did not say so.

"It has been folly and madness with us both, through the piece," he continued, "and now, I suppose, we a reaping our reward. To gratify a wild, harty funey, ear took for the other, I was false to you, Susan, and to eye spark of honour that ought to have stirred within m

"Mr. Caraagie," she interrupted, "speak on any topicly that. It is ungenerous of you to allude to it."

"I know that; it was but a passing allusion; but should like you to glean how bitter to me are the ashes o self-reproach. I should think they are to her for he conduct at that time-for you had been to her a tender loving sister, and did not merit such a requital. What has followed that ill-advised step? We have led a cat-and-dag life together, and now she has lost herself; and In-he stamped his foot - am dishonoured in the sight of men."

"Have proof before you judge her harshly," whispered Susan again, "She may not have proceeded to extremes, or intend to do so. I will not believe, until I have absolute proof, that a sister of mine could so forget herself,"

"I will wait for no proof, and I will never spare her," vehemently answered Mr. Carmagic, "The very moment that the law will rid me of her, I will be free, I am surprised you can seek to pulliate her conduct, Susan, for her sin and shame tell upon you and her own family, almost as they do on me. Let us drop her name for ever."

He rose and stood as if gazing on the versuidah and the prospect beyond it, probably seeing nothing. thoughts turned, perhaps in spite of her wish, to the past, when she had been looking forward joyfully to her marriage with him. That marriage had been frustrated; yet here she was, in little more than twelve months, in his house, slone with him, far away from her own home and kindred; some with him, now, in this room, and yet not his wife! It was very strange; and it was very undesirable; even with the visit of Mrs. Freeman it was undesirable. Susan felt her position neutrly, and leaned her head on her hand in perplexity.

"What a future to be unticipated !" suddenly exclaimed

" What will it be?" la Carnagie.

"Ay, indeed," said Susan, rousing herself, "She did not aink of her future when she left her home."

"Her future!" he scornfully rejained-"her future equires no speculating upon; she has plainly marked it out or herself, and entered upon it; I was speaking of my own. folitude and dissutisfaction are before me."

"I feel for you deeply. I wish I knew how to whisper a iopo that it may be soothed to you."

"I wish you would whispor it, Susan," he answered, And again there was a pause, which returning to his seat. Mr. Carnagie broke. I do not "In a certain time I shall be clear of her. know how long these proceedings take, but I shall go to England and enter upon them immediately; they will gran me leave under the circumstances. In a few months from now I shall be a free man. Will you not whisper a hop for that period, Susan ?"

She did not catch his meaning. "What hope is the lat I can whisper? "

He bent towards her; he spoke in low tones; tones.a tender as they had been in the years gone by. "Cannever be again with us, Sasan, as it used to be? Will ye not come out here, and take her place, and be to me " Mr. Carna dearest wife?"

Susan sat with eyes and mouth open-

"If you will only forgive my infatuated folly, and we member it no more. Oh, Susan! put it into my power to atone for it! When the time shall come, if you will only have pity on me, and he mine, my whole life shall be on long atonement. Remember what we were to each other let it come to us again. United in heart and hand, blessing may be in store for both of us."

Had Susan been strong and well, she would no doubt have left Lieutemant Carnagie and the room to themselves as it was, after a vain attempt to rise, which he prevented she burst into a miserable flood of tears.

"It needed not your presence here to renew my affection for you," he proceeded. "It had never really left you, though it was obscured by the ill-omened feeling that rushed over me and—her. That feeling, call it by what name we might, was neither affection nor love: it was a species of frenzy, a delirium, without foundation and without strength, and that's the best that can be said of it. Had you not come out here, Susan, my affection for you would have died away by degrees; in your presence, and with my wife still true to me, I would have buried it, and did bury it, within myself; you should never have heard of it or suspected it. But she is gone, and you and I are left: I pray you fet us agree to reader the future bright to each other."

She wrenched away the hand which he had taken, and overed her burning and tearful face, whilst sobs chokel her atterance. "Oh, Mr. Carnagie! you are very cruel!"

"I love you better than of old: I love you, as I believe man never loved woman: I will strive to make your life one long sunshine. Susan I you are in my house; you tended my sick-bed and brought me round; you have no other protector here but my own self. Surely it all points to the expediency of your promising to become my wife. You must see it."

a Will you be generous?--can you be generous?" she tored, in sareastic tones, yet almost beside herself.

"I can and will be generous to you."

Then release me, that I may instantly go from your You will, if you have a spark of manly feeling resonce. ithin you."

"Will you not listen to me?"

"I will not listen to you; how dare you ask it? My ister is your wife; your wife, Mr. Carnagie; and you are lisgracing yourself and insulting me. To suffer what you ave been saying to enter your thoughts, much more to give sterance to it, ought to have dyed your brow with shame. Proceed no further: I have friends in the island, close at hand, who will protect me if I appeal to them."

He looked gloomily at her. "Have you learned to hate me, Susan ? "

"I had not learned to hate you. I esteemed you, and liked you, as my sister's husband. You are teaching me to hate you now."

"Look at my future," he returned; "consider what it will be. Left here, to my desorted home, without any to are for me, or to make it what a home ought to be; minted at as a wronged man?—have you no compassion for me?"

"Yes, I have every compassion for you—as your wife's sister. All other ties between us have long been over."

"Never to be renewed? Will no entreaty persuade you not even the pleadings of my unhappy love?"

Never 1 Never 1 1 would almost rather have died in the fever than have lived to receive this insult: I would far rather die thun become your wife! You see that poor black slave," she vehemently cried, pointing to Jicko, who was at work in the garden-" well; were it offered me to choose between you, I would marry him rather than you!" Mr. Carnagio gave vent to a violent explosion of wo and strode from the room, closing the door after him we such force that it shook the slightly-built house. And Su Chase, shuttered in spirit and in frame, fell into hyster and sobbed and cried, unheard by all.

She was growing more composed, and had risen to go her own room, when Mr. Leicester entered. She sat do again, vexed that he should observe, which he could not to to do, the traces of emotion on her face.

"I bring you a message from my sister," he said. "8 finds more to look to at home than she anticipated, and a not he able to return before dinner: not matil late in t evenling."

Susan's state of feeling was such that she dated not spea Her heart and eyes were brimful and running over. At now to be told that Mrs. Freeman would not be bee until night; all those hours alone in the house with M Carnagio.

"You do not look well, Miss Chase," he observed: "we ur happy."

The team must come; there was no help for it, and the rained down; but she namaged to steady her voice.

"Mr. Loicester, you were kind enough, before my illness came on, to give me an invitation to your house. I wisk i could be moved there."

"It is the very thing I and Mrs. Freeman have been speaking of to-day," he unswered, pleasure beaming from his eyes. "We think the change would be most desirable. As soon as you shall be a little stronger, Mrs. Freeman can return home, and you with her."

"I am strong enough now," answered Sman, and her tone struck Mr. Loicester as one of painful engerness. Lee mescome at once, this afternoon. I cannot walk so are yet, but disker only drive me in the carriage. I shall ot trouble you long," she continued, "for I shall sail by he next packet."

"Oh no, indeed," he interrupted, answering her last entence, "the next packet goes in a few days; we must seep you longer with us than that. Putting other confiderations uside, you would not be strong enough to underake the voyage."

"Strong or weak, I must go," she replied; "I cannot rmain in Barbadoes. I wish I had never come to it."

"I hope nothing unpleasant has imppened," he said, meaking with hesitation.

"No," returned Susan, evasively, "nothing particular. Only—after—after the step my sister has taken, it is not agreeable to me to meet Mr. Carnagie. I shall be truly thankful for the shelter of your house and protection until I sail: and perhaps some time, in England, opportunity will be afforded us of returning your kind hospitality."

"Dear Miss Chase," he said in low tones, "need you sail at all ?"

Susan looked at him. Was he going to plead for Mr. Carangie? No; he was going to plead for himself; and the warm colour rushed into the wan face of Susan. Perhaps she had half suspected that he might some time do it.

"You propose to honour my house with a temporary visit; to accept of my temporary protection; oh, Miss Chase, may I not ask you to accept of them for all time? I have admired and loved you ever since we met, and my dearest wish has long been that the future shall see you my wife let me hope for it!"

What with one offer and another, Susan was certainly confounded. She did not, in consequence, answer so readily as she might have done.

"My sistor is soon to marry Mr. Grape," he resumed :

"I mention it, lest you might deem her being with men impediment in the way: but she probably has told ve All that the most tender --- "

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Leicester," interrupted Susa recovering her senses; " pray do not continue; it will on be painful to us both. I feel sensibly your good oping of me; your kind offer; and I thank you, but I can on decline it. Firmly and irrevocably decline it."

"Have you another attachment?" he asked, with 880 dened eyes and flushed face.

"No, indeed: but that is nothing to the purpose. It impossible for me to entertain your offer. Please, do no recur to the subject again."

He sat silent a few minutes; he saw there was no hor for him ; that she meant what she said ; and, with a sigl he prepared to depart.

Then-I will go back now, and tell my sister to expo vou ? "

"Yes-if--" Sean looked at him and hesitated After what had just passed, would be like her to become his guest? she was asking herself. Mr. Leicester's though were quick,

"I am going up the country on a mission," he lustend to say. "I start this evening, and shall be away some days. I am sure Mrs. Freeman will strive to make yes comfortable, both for me and herself."

Mow Susan thanked him in her heart. He held out his hand.

"I may not see you again, Miss Classe. May the blessing of Heaven go with you, wherever you may be. Fare you

"Farewoll, and thank you for all," was her tearful response, as she returned his hand's fervent chasp.

She watched him away, and then she stepped on to the andah, called to Jicko, and ordered him to get the risge ready. Next she proceeded to her chamber, gave ections to Brillianna about sending her things after her Mrs. Freeman's, and then she sat down and wrote a life of Mr. Carmagic, Before she had well finished lieko and the carriage came round. Susan tottered was the steps of the verandah, entered the carriage, and quitted bientenant Carmagic's roof for ever.

Within a week she was in her berth on board the good ip which was ploughing the waves on its way to England, at that was all the recompense and the satisfaction that san Chase obtained from her well-intentioned but ill-ared visit to Barbadoes.

CHAPTER VIII.

HOME AT LAST.

Thu quay at Liverpool was alive with lostle and noise a large West Indian ship had just arrived after its p perous voyage. It was a winter's day; the cold m itself felt, and the passengers, when they left the sl were not sorry to lasten to the shelter of warm hotels. \ One of them, a young and good-looking lady, a ontored an hotel to leave it again. As soon as a po chaise could be got ready she took her sent in it to farther on. She looked ill and careworn, as if her he or her mind had suffered; perhaps both, ?

"It is an expensive way of travelling," she said herself, "but it was better to come on. Another nig of this suspense, now I am so near to them, would be seemed longer than all the rest. I wonder whother Ist hear of her? I wonder whether she has made her way

It was about seven o'clock in the evening when a reached that home. A servant, whom she did not rece nize, answered the summons at the door.

"Is Miss Chase within ?"

" Yes, ma'am,"

"Oh, I am very glad! See to the luggage, will you I will go on in."

"The luggage last it to come here, ma'am?"

"Yes," smiled the traveller. "You are strange in the iouse, or you would not ask it. I am Miss Susan Chase." The girl's eyes brightened with intelligence. m'am! I think Miss Ursula has been expecting you. I m pleused you have got home safely, from such a long 78Y.11

Ursula Chase was sitting near the fire, reading by the ht of a shaded lamp, which, though it threw its brights on the page, cust its shadow on the room. She turned and when the door opened, and saw, indistinctly, a figure iffled up.

"Uranla, don't you know me?"

"Susan I Susan I"

Ursula, always cold and calm, was aroused out of her ture. She loved her sister Susan better than any one in o world : or, it may be more correct to say, she loved one but Susan. She chasped her, she hurried off her appings, she gently pushed her into an easy-chair; and, ully, sat down in her own, and burst into tears. The nable, undemonstrative Ursula Chase !

"Forgive my being absurd, Susan; but I am so rejoiced have you back, safe and sound."

She had set Susan on, and she was crying also, far more tterly than Ursula. The many disagreeable points of her bomened visit were pressing painfully on her rememrance, and she sobbed aloud.

"I wish I had been guided by you, Ursula, and had ever gone! I shall repeat it as long as I live." Well, well, it is over and done with. I will make you ome tea. You look as if you had been ill, Susan.?

"I have been very ill."

"On the voyage home?"

" No. At Barbadoes."

Ursula ordered the tea in, and busied herself in making it. "I am so delighted to see you," she said, "that a scolding has gone out of my head; but I assure Susan, I had prepared a sharp one for you."

" For my lawing gone ont?"

"No. Those old bygones must be bygones,  $\mathfrak{p}_0$ having come home with Mrs. Carnagie, think of remaining behin ber Susan's heart leaped into her mouth, "Did Emma-Mrs. Carangie come here on her return?"

"Yes, She is here now,"

"Now! In the house?"

"Not in the house. She is spending the day at Ashleys',"

"Did she say why I did not come with her?" inqu Susan.

1 6 I could not get from her why you did not comeindeed, why she came herself, There is no cordia between us. Had I been here alone, I should have be tempted to refuse to receive her. But Henry Impper to be at home then and was pleased to welcome her, and is his house, not mine ( When he went away again, charged me to make her comfortable as long as she lik to stay here. I questioned her as fittle as possible, but ti excuses she gave sounded frivolous to me that you we not ready, and stopped to nurse Mr. Carmegie, who we going to have a fever. It struck me that she ought to hav a sumed the authority vested in a married woman, as insisted on your returning with her. Susan, I have said that I am not going to scold you now; but Mr. Carangle house was not quite the place for you, unsanctioned by the

"No, it was not," spoke Sman, in resentful tones, for Emuna's heartless conduct aroused every spark of indignation within her, "She should have told you the truth-that gave me no chance of coming with her. Ursula 1 she nawny from Barbadoes."

Ursula had the teapet in her hand, preparing to pour out a tea. She put it down, and turned her eyes on Susan. Ran away!"

"Chandestinely. We knew no more of her leaving than midd. She dressed for an evening party, went to it—as supposed—and never came home again. The next day found that she had sailed for England."

"And her reason?" imperiously demanded Ursula, who at never any charity to spare for ill-doing.

I have not seen her since, you know. She and Mr. armgio were not very happy together."

That is more than likely," responded Ursula, in a marked tone. "But Mr. Carmagio ought to have told you, she did not. Of course," she added, an unpleasant les obtrading itself, "she did not come without his anction?"

"Yes; and without his knowledge also, Ursula. And that made it worse, he was sickening for a fever; and, for Il she knew, he might have died in it."

ays, remained to nurse."

"I did help to murse him through it. And took it myelf, and nearly lost my life."

Ideas crowded fast upon the mind of Ursula Chase. Her brow contracted. "Were you laid up there—in his house salone?"

"Not alone. A friend, a widow lady, came to be with me the day after Emma left. And when I was well enough, Iremoved to her house until I sailed."

"It is the most incomprehensible story altogether attered Ursula, "I mean Emma's proceedings. I did she leave Barbadoes for? What does she d England? All I have heard her say about it is, that he health was bad, and she wanted a change. It appears to be good enough when she came here."

. There was nothing the matter with her health. Ung -the worst part of the history remains behind : shedi not come away alone,"

"I know that. Ruth came with her. The girl la leave for a week now, and is gone to see her friends,"

"I do not mean Ruth. She had made herself-Susan hesitated: between her strong hope that Emmi might be innocent, and the obligation that was upon herk disclose the plain truth, she was somewhat at a loss hos to frame her words - Emma land made herself conspicuos with a friend of Mr. Carmagie's; had been too much in his company; too free in her manners with him.  $H_0 \sim$ Susan dropped her voice to a whisper "left Barbadag with her."

Ursula turned white. And her tone, as she hastly rejoined, rese to a shrick.

" His name was not Chard? Susan, it was not Chard?

"Captain Chard," was Susan's sad rejoinder.

Uranla's face presented a picture of dismay. After a pause, she spoke.

"He came here with her."

"Came here 1" echoed Susan. "Did he stay here?"

"No. A couple of hours only. She introduced him to Henry as a friend of Mr. Carmgie's, who had taken charge of her over, Susan 1 she has a letter from that man over morning-every morning of her life. One day Henry asked her who her regular correspondent was, and she acknowledged it was Captain Chard: she said he was transacting business relative to Barbadoes, and it was, necessary, she should be kept informed of its progress What are we to do with her? If she is what she may

-she shall not contaminate this house. Nor would mry wish her to be with us."

"It may not be so," cried Susan, eagerly. "At any e, Ursula, it is not for us so to judgo her, or to proclaim

We must wait for the explanation."

When is it to come? What is she going to do here? w long is she going to remain?" reiterated Ursula, with howning brow.

Susan shook her head. "I know nothing. Mr. Carnagio coming over."

"What for ?"

"To get a divorce," she answered in a low tone. "Assays. But if he finds no grounds...........

Ursula rose; she paced the room in excitement. vorced woman't what a disgrace to the family! our ter! I wish the ship had sunk with them!"

Do not --- who's this coming in?" cried "Ursule 1 son, breaking off her remonstrance, Frances Maitland, I believe. It is like the bustle She is always coming in when she is not g mukes. inted."

Frances Maithard it was. Susan's close friend for many ars. She was inexpressibly surprised to see Sasan.

"To think that I should find you here! I came in to an hour with Ursula, knowing Emma was out to-night, d here are you ! "

"Safe at home again, after all my travels and wander-ga," answered Susan.

The three guthered round the fire, Susan in the easyair, Frances on a footstool close to her, and talked of old mes and present ones. Ursula said little.

"Susan," cried Frances, at length, " is there not someing wrong between Emmu and her husband? —It is not I blue sky, is it ?"

- "I have certainly seen more letting complete," was Susan reioitaler.
- "Did you ever see a more harme one? I prophess they would have no fuch. What do you think Emma go to me the other day ? "
  - "Some nousense, perhaps,"
- "I took it for sense by her teste and leads. That of an the live animals walking on two bar, there was not one she detested half so much as she detected Licutemant Carmigig
- " Emma was always given to makene tandom assertions" returned Susan, "You know that, Something like your self, Frances,"
- *Susan, are they separated (" resumed Frances, lowering. her voice.
  - "Separated! What do you mean ?"
- "I do not believe she is going back to him," was France Maithand's answer. "I was telling her she had better invite me to go home with her to Barbadons, and saw said it was no home of hers, and never should be again. it all mean yo What does
- "I am not in Emma's considence," replied Susan. may have said it in a moment of pique."
- "And she seems to have as lutle intention of staying long here. I must say one thing, however, Susan-stlat you were determined to have enough of your old lover's company, to remain with him, instead of coming home with Runna I 'If some of us giddy ones were to do such a thing we should be called all to pieces for it."

Poor Susan felt her face flush, and she leaned her head upon her hand. Ursula aroused herself, and spoke up in the stern tone she took when displeased.

"You seem to forget my sister's fatigue, or you would not tense her to-night with absurd jokes. In all that Susan has done she has had but one motive love to Mrs. Carmada "...

of know that," cried Frances. "I wish we were all as me-hearted and full of love as Susan. We cannot say as uch for Fanna."

Miss Muitland remained late, but Emma did not come in. hen she rose to go, Ursula said she had a request to make her.

«What is it?"

"Should you meet Mrs. Carnagie on your way, do not say ist Susan has returned. We want to surprise her."

a Very well. I won't."

"She need not talk about having enough of a lover's impany," exclaimed Uranta, as Frances left. "A pretty fair she has had herself, Susan, since you have been away." "Indeed! A fresh one?"

"Threw herself, point blank, at the head-or the heartfa new curate we had. She nearly termented his life out f him; meeting him in his walks, and at the cottages, and aviting him to their house. It was too barefaced. lid not respond ; and people do say that he threw up the aracy to be rid of her."

"Frances was wild to be married, years ago, and I con dude, as the time gets on, and she gets on, that her anxiet loes not lessen."

"She's wild to be a simpleton," sharply retorted Ursula. When Mrs. Carnagie was heard entering the hall, Susa rose from her seat in agitation. She could not meet her unnoved, and she hid hold of the table to steady herself.

Mrs. Carnagie came in. One amazed glance, one quick look of perplexity in her face, and then it resumed its indifference again. She had possibly anticipated the present moment, and prepared herself for it. She had recovered all her European good looks, and was prottier than ever.

"Susan! What wind blew you here? Are you alone?" -she looked round the room, "Is he come?"

"No. If you allude to your husband."

"He is not any hasband of mine; and is not going to again. Don't honour him so far as to give him the title!

"Are you aware, madam, what has come to my know ledge?" uttered Uranha, advancing, and planting herse before Mrs. Carnagie. "That you quitted your husband home clandestinely, and left your sister unprotected in M Carnagic's house?"

"Susan is not a child. She is old enough to proto herself," was the flippant answer.

"How dured you come home to me with your untruths that Susan was not ready to accompany you? You did not give her the opportunity of doing so. You did no wish it."

"Perhaps I did not," returned Mrs. Carnagie.

"Emma," interposed Susan, "your conduct to me had been cruel, utterly unjustifiable and unpardomable. How could you think of quitting therbadoes without me? of leaving me alone with Mr. Carnagie?"

"What if I did? You have not eaten each other up." Ursala's hands tingled to inflict personal chastisement upon her, as they had sometimes done when Emma was a child. Susan spoke:

"And your conduct was even more cruel to your husband. He was attacked with the fever, and you knew it. He had it dangerously; so dangerously that it was a mercy he did-not die."

"I wish he had I" fervently uttored Mrs. Carmagic, "If praying for it would have taken him, he'd have gone, for I was doing that all the voyage over. Young Grape was on board just before we sailed, and reported that Carmagia had been sent home delirious."

Susan sat down in dismay. Even Ursula was silenced. What were they to do with hor?

"Are you aware that he is following you to England ?and for what purpose?" sternly demanded Ursula.

"To get a divorce, I hope," was the cool reply.

It struck Ursula damb.

"If he has any spirit, he will sue for a divorce, that's all," added Mrs. Carmgie.

"Oh, you wicked woman !" uttered the indigment Ursula. To come here, in brazen impudence, and bring him with rot! That man! Did you forget, madam, that this was respectable house -that it was once your mother's, and that it is now mine?"

"Forget it, no," said Emma; " and I am quite as remeetable as you are. And so is he."

"Susan, is she mad ?"

Emma advanced forward, her whole face lighted up with passion. "I have done no wrong," she said. "I left my home in the way I did to get rid of my husband, rid of his name, and to become free again. I concerted my plans with Captain Chard. When Mr. Carnagie sucs for a divorce, which of course he must do, he will obtain it, for it will be mopposed, and then I shall become Captain Chard's wife. He has loved me long, and I love him. I have done no wrong," she repeated, with flashing eyes, "and Captain Chard would not lead me into it; but rather "-she dropped her voice ... than not be rid of Lieutenaut Carnagic, we would run away to-morrow."

"Oh, Emma!" exclaimed Susan. "If we believe you, can you expect the world will do so?"

"It will have to. Once let the divorce be pronounced, and we shall make our assertions good. Rath can bear good testimony, and so can others. Mr. Carnagic has had a letter before this, despatched on my arrival here, that will sting him into seeking a divorce : it was purposely worded for it."

"Are you not afraid of other consequences than a divorcept asked Susan. "Mr. Carmyie is bifreely indigmant agains Captain Chard. He says he will shoot him."

"Two can play at that game," retorted Mrs. Carmage,

"I hope," uttered Urania, in fervent tones, "that you Captain Chard will be draumed out of the regiment, A reputable commander 1 9

"Too late," surcustically rejoined Mrs. Carnagie, "Ik has sold out,"

"The kindest thing that could have happened to you would have been a shipwreek to the bottom of the 80%," <sup>6</sup> Thank you.

The waves were not of your opinion, you perceive. I hope and trust he may get ships recked coming over. It would save a world of trouble, and I and Captain Chard would hold a public rejoicing over it. Have you any more fault to find with me? Because, if not, I am

No reply was made, and Mrs. Carnagic quitted the room "Susan," muttered Uranla again, " is she mad? will become of us all, in the eyes of the world ?"

"Can what she says he true?" usked Susan. inclined to believe it."

"What difference does it make, whether true or false?" retorted Ursula. "We know the construction that must The put on such conduct. I shall write to Henry i a letter! that will bring him home. If he persists in allowing her to remain in the house, I shall loses to "

CHAPTER IX.

FRANCIS MAPTIAND'S ANGER.

Tweeve months more passed away, and Emma Carnagie's strange plans were hearing fruit. Mr. Carnagie had lost no time; the very ship which had brought Sasan home, had also brought certain instructions from Mr. Carnagie to his solicitors, and he had followed them later. An action was forthwith commenced against Captain Chard, "Carnagie v. Chard." It was undefended at the trial, and judgment and damages were suffered to go by default. In early spring, seventeen months after her departure from her husband's home, Mrs. Carnagie was pronounced to have forfeited all claim to his name for ever. During the proceedings, Mrs. Carnagie had resided with one of her brothers, for Ursula had been bitter, unforgiving, and yehement.

Before the divorce was finally pronounced, Susan and Ursula were invited to spend some time with an aged relative in Wales. They necepted it readily, glad to be away from their own neighbourhood for a while: Ursula was wont to declare, every time she went out, that the people "looked at her," as if to remind her that she was the sister of Mrs. Carnagie. They were away three months, and the chief change which they found on their return was, that their rector had obtained a six months' leave of absence, and a stranger was residing in the rectory and officiating for him.

On the following day, Sunday, they went to church ( usual. The new clergymun had just a seemled the reading desk. Susan looked at him : she rubbed her eyes an looked again; it was surely Mr. Laicester, whom she ha left in Barbadoes! And now their gaze met, and ther was no longer room for doubt.

"I like him very much !" cried Ursula, alluding to the new clergyman, as they were walking home from churd after service. "I wonder who he is ?"

"I can tell you," said Susan. "It is Mr. Leicester, 1 know him, Ursula,"

"You! Where have you known him?"

"In Barbadoes. He had a church there. It was to his house I was removed from Mr. Carmegie's. You have for gotten the name, perhaps. It was his nister, Mrs. Freeman, who nursed me through the fever. They were very kind to me, and I am under great obligations to them."

"Is he married, this Mr. Leicester ?"

"No. At least he was not then."

"There was a lady in the paraonage pay?"

A quick step behind them, a step Susan thought she remembered, and she turned round to find her hand taken by Mr. Leicester, a tall, fine man, with an intellectual countenance. What with old resollections, and perhaps conscious present feelings, Susan felt her face become one orimson glow, as he held her hand and looked into her eyes.

"My sistor Ursula," she said, turning them away. "I do not know when I have been so much surprised as to-day,

"To see me officiating in your own parish," he laughed. When you left me far away, not so very long ago."

"Have you come over on leave of absence?"

"I have come over for good. My health has been very different for twelve months past, so I resigned my apontment there. I am in expectation of preferment in agland, but meanwhile this offered and I took it."

When they arrived at their house, he entered with them. Isala went upstairs to take off her things, Susan remain-g in the drawing-room with Mr. Leicester.

"May I inquire after your sister?" he said in low tones. "She is just married again. They were married the istant it was possible after the divorce was obtained. lon must have heard that amongst our friends here, for have no doubt they have been full of it,"

"Yes, it has been a prolific topic," replied Mr. Leicester.

The marriage was also in the newspapers."

"In every newspaper in the United Kingdom, I think;" aturned Susan, her tone betraying her vexation. "All possible publicity that could be given to it, Captain and Mrs. Chard gave. They sent out cards and cake to every family they knew."

"They are travelling, are they not?"

"They have gone to Germany, I believe. But we have held no communication with themselves. My sister Ursula resents Emma's conduct deeply."

"But if Mrs. Carmagie is to be believed, there was little to resent. So the neighbourhood here says."

"I think she is to be believed; indeed, there appears to be no doubt about it. But we feel that, even at its best, she has brought great disgrace into the family, and Ursula will never forget or forgive it."

"Mr. Carnagie is also about to marry again."

"Is he?" exclaimed Susan.

"You remember those wealthy planters on that larg estate a few miles off Barbadoes?"

"Yes. The Prance estate, you mean."

"He is going to marry Miss Prance."

"Why, she was a half-caste!" uttere! Susan, after purse of annizoment.

Mr. Leicester nodded. "It has caused a good deal g surprise in Barbadoes. She will have a very large fortung

- "It was said she was very crack," observe I Sasan, and would heat her slaves with her own hand."
- "And I know that to be true," said Mr. beleesty "However, Mr. Carnagic is to marry ber. He was only waiting for the necessary time to clapse after the divorce,"
- "I heartily wish him more happiness than in his last marriage," said Susan; "and perhaps he may find it although she is half-caste. When she is an Englishman wife she may be taught that slaves are possessed of human feelings, as she is, and learn to treat them kimily."
  - "Did you see Mr. Carnagie when he was in England?",
- "Yes. He came here; but it was only a passing visit," answered Susan. "I was glid when he went back against I was always fearing that he and Captain Chard might meet. Mr. Carnagie came over intending to challenge him; but his lawyers told him that if he took the law into his own hands he would not get his divorce. I suppose they only said it to prevent bloodshed. How is Mrs. Freeman? Did she come home with you?"
- "No; she remains in Barbadoes. She is Mrs. Grape now.
  I have an elder sister staying here with me. Miss Leicester."
  - · "Do you like the neighburhood } "
- "Not so well as I had anticipated. I shall like it better ow I have an old friend in it," he added, with a smile. And Susan's colour despend again, for which she could have boxed her own ears.

The time went on. The neighbourhood, to whom Frances Maitland's flirting propensities were nothing new, grew into the habit of joking her about Mr. Leicester. She was little Anxious as she was to be married—and as it was known that she was—often as she had striven to emplish the desired end by setting her cap (the popular se) at single men, she had never set it so stronuously, not with one who had so won upon her regard, as Mr. ester; and she grew to show it too plainly. Frances ated him. Go where he would, he met her—in the k, in the village, amongst the poor, and in the vestry his church. For Frances had constituted herself a ish visitor, and had for ever some question to ask. Leicester. She was very handsome, with beautiful tures and brilliant dark eyes, and, like too many other alsome girls, thought herself irresistible.

And yet with all this she did not get on. No, do what would, she did not advance a step nearer her hope than had been at the commencement. Mr. Leicester was ways civil, always polite, often conversed with her, but it his manner would not betray a deeper interest. "I mader," thought Frances to herself, "whether he has any tachment elsewhere! Perhaps he has left some one behind in Barbadoes."

"You are wasting your time," Miss Ashley abruptly served to her one hot summer's day, as she came upon rances sitting in the park.

"What in ?" inquired Frances.

"Running after Mr. Leicester."

"Well, I'm sure!" uttered Frances. "What next? I on't run after him."

"The sun does not shine, does it, Frances? It's not possite to you at this moment?" ironically returned Makhley. "Why, what are you sitting on this benefic what to eaten him as he goes by from the cottainty dear, our perceptive faculties, in these parts, are puried in a wood."

"I don't care whether they are buried or not," augiretorted Frances. "I suppose I may sit in the open aira day when it's too hot to remain indoors without havicovert motives imputed to me."

"Don't put yourself out. I only say you are wasti your time; and you ought to be obliged to me for telling you, as you can't see it for yourself. I think you are built in a wood, Frances, or you would see where Mr. Leiesste hopes are fixed. Love's eyes are blind, they say."

"What do you mean? Fixed where?"

"He is nothing to me, so I have my sight about is and have suspected the truth some time. I should is wonder but it was her being here brought him into it place."

"Who? Who?" impariently demanded Frances, staming her foot.

"Susan Chase,"

"Susan Chase?" repeated Miss Maitland. "What in she to do with Mr. Leicester?"

"Nothing-as yet. But I think it will come to it. The like each other."

Frances Maitland turned away her head. "How do you know this?"

"I was speaking to Susan one day about her having known Mr. Leicester in Barbadoes, and she grew confused and red, as she had never grown before but at the many of Mr. Carnagio. It set me wondering. I have watched them since, and I feel sure he likes her. There is a pear than tone in his voice when he speaks to her, a gentlement in his manner, which he gives to not one else. And hold with her often. He makes his health a plea for avoiding general visiting, but he can go there and pass most of his evenings. You have been wasting your time, Frances."

"She can't expect to marry after her affair with Mr.

magic," spoke Frances, in a fury -- "especially Mr. fester. The idea of her taking in a clergyman 1" That's past and gone. The Carnagio affair need be impediment to her marrying another. I don't see that need."

Don't you?" was the sulky answer. "Then I do."

Bessy Ashley houghed.

when Suean was engaged to him for years, was wild or him! After their wedding-day being fixed twice over, to before he went to Earhadoes, and three years afterals, when he returned from it, and she loving him all attime, and pining after him! You call that no impedient," persisted Frances Maitland. "Then I do."

"Not a bit of it. Neither would you, if you were not midded," returned Miss Ashley.

The conversation had turned Frances Maitland's blood gall. Susan Chase to win the prize for which she d been striving 1. Not if she could prevent it. She sat, after Miss Ashley left her, nourishing her jealousy, wishing her resentment, working herself into a positive str.

Presently Mr. Leicester was discerned crossing the corner like park. Frances rose and met him, and then turned parsue her walk by his side.

"It is a hot day," he observed. .

"So hot that I hoped to find a little coolness strolling bost under these shady trees," replied Frances, whose cart was beating wildly, and whose colour went and came, he was just in the mood to let her tengue commit itself, I she were not careful.

"I have come from the cottages," said Mr. Leicester. The poor people have been pleased to tell me they shall esory to lose me."

"I dare say they will be. Our rector does not trouble himself about cottage people, But you are not going ; Mr. Loicestor y "

"I came for six months, and have been here five."

"But-was there not some hope given to us that's might remain longer?" cried Frances, looking at him, a speaking quickly. "We heard so,"

"The rector wrote to propose it, and the bishop we have been agreeable. That must be what you heard,"

"Yes. Will you not remain?"

He looked at her in turn, and smiled. "I cannot ff would; though I did not know that until this morning The post brought me the welcome news that I have be appointed to a living, and I must take possession of its soon as I can be released from this,"

Frances Matchand's heart saute within her. If he k without speaking, there would be good-bye to her hop for ever.

What shall we all do without you?" she said bantering. "Nay; what shall I do without you? I think that wi be the real question." But he only spoke generally, as Frances knew it.

"What will Susan Chasa do without you?" whispers Frances, anable longer to repress her bitter jealous "Report says that she will especially miss Mr. Leicester"

"Report is very kind to say anything so thattering," wa his reply; and Frances saw the hot firsh mount to his bres

"And that Mr. Leicester will miss Mice Chase. It if so?" she eried, with all the vehemence of her ill-regulated nature. But she was beside herself that day.

"Miss Muitland must pardon me. I do not see that! need satisfy gossip on the score of my private affairs."

"You cannot have serious thoughts of Busan Chase," she continued, in agitation ; "or, if you have, you do not know her provious history."

himself about cottage people. But you are not going Mr. Leicester?"

"I came for six months, and have been here five,"

"But—was there not some hope given to us that, might romain longer?" cried Frances, looking at him; speaking quickly. "We heard so."

"The rector wrote to propose it, and the bishop we have been agreeable. That must be what you heard."

"Yes. Will you not remain?"

He looked at her in turn, and smiled. "I cannot would; though I did not know that until this more The post brought me the welcome news that I have a appointed to a living, and I must take possession of i soon as I can be released from this."

Frances Maithard's heart suck within her. If he without speaking, there would be good-bye to her he for ever.

"What shall would do without you?" she said bantering "Nay; what shall I do without you? I think that be the real question." But he only spoke generally, Frances knew it.

"What will Susan Chase do without you?" whisp Frances, unable longer to repress her bitter jeals "Roport says that she will especially miss Mr. Leicester

"Report is very kind to say anything so flattering," his reply; and Frances saw the hot flush mount to his bi

"And that Mr. Leicester will miss Miss Chase. I so?" she cried, with all the vehenence of her ill-regul nature. But she was beside herself that day.

"Miss Maitland must pardon me. I do not see the need satisfy gossip on the score of my private affairs."

"You cannot have serious thoughts of Susan Chase," continued, in agitation; "or, if you have, you do not k her previous history."

"Have you heard the news?" asked Mr. Leicester.

" No."

- "I wonder at that, for news spreads fast in this vicinity dImentioned it this morning."
- "What is it ?" usked Susan.
- "That I have had a living presented to me."
- * Indeed ! Then you will be leaving this."
- "At the month's end, I wonder whether any one will egret me ? "
- "Oh yes," involuntarily answered Susan. "Many will," he hastened to udd.
- "Susan," he said, in a lower tone, as he advanced close aher and took her hand, "must I go alone?"
- She strove to take it from him, but he would not let her. 'Has not the time come when I may speak again?" he whispered. "Susan, we are both leading lonely lives. Why should it be so ? Had I come here and found you with my object, or probable object, of attachment, I should have abided by the old refusal and never more have recurred to jt. But it is not so, for you remain alone in the world. There have been times lately -- may I speak out freely?" he broke off to usk, "frankly, as if the undisguised heart spoke, and not the lips?"

"Yes, yes," she answered.

"Then I have at times fancied you were inclined to rgret that refusal: that you were beginning to esteem me more than you did when you pronounced it."

"I could not esteem you more than I did then, Mr.

Leicestor," she said, in gentle tones.

Well-esteem is too cold a word, but-I did not dare to make it warmer. The joy that hope has brought to me is great; too great to be crushed now. Oh, Susan, you must listen to me! think how long I have leved you! What caused me to leave Barbadoes? The thought of you, quite as much as my breaking health. What made messe employment in this locality? The hope of being remain to you."

Now, the truth was, if Susan did not repent her form rejection of Mr. Leicester immediately on its being give she had done so very soon afterwards. That is, she repent having put a barrier to her friend-hip and intimacy within. During the voyage home she had had leisure reflect on his estimable qualities, his welcome society, to noble conduct to herself; and he gradually became the obright apot in the sad Barbadoes reminiscence. During him: not, however, as she had once leved another. The could never be again for Susan Chase; it never is, for any or

She stood closer to the window, pressed her forehead a its frame, and spoke in subdued tones.

"There are circumstances in my past life, which, if known to you, would probably forbid you to think of me as your doing. Before I relate them to you, I must premit that all you have said may be no retracted. I shall make stand it as such. No, Mr. Loicester "for he sought take her hand again..." listen first."

"When I was eighteen, I became engaged to a you officer; our marriage was arranged, and I was to accompa him abroad. My mother's death prevented it, and he sail without me. We corresponded for more than three year and then he returned to fulfil his engagement. It w Lieutenant Carangie."

Susan stopped, but Mr. Leicester made no comment.

"He returned to marry me; but, ere the wedding-day, found that his love for me had changed into a love for n youngest sister—a strong, uncontrollable passion, as appeared, and she shared it. I sacrificed my own feeling released him, and they were married."

g Go on, Susan."

"From that moment I strove to drive him from my art: it was a hard and bitter task, but I succeeded erably well: and when Emma wrote that she was ffering in health, miserable, and had a presentiment of ing in her approaching illness, I thought it my duty to out to Barladoes to her. Ursula would not do so. here I met you, Mr. Leicester,"

"And your sister requited your kindness by quitting you the manner she did !"

You can understand, now, why I felt it so "Yes. adesirable to be left under the roof of Mr. Carnagie. Not," lded Susan, turning her truthful eyes upon him, "that ly trace of former feeling remained in my heart. Oh no, at had been completely cradicated; but I felt my position n umpleasant one."

"It was so."

"And it proved so. One day after I had recovered from y former illness-I wish to tell you all, Mr. Leicesterleutement Curragie so far forgot himself as to speak of w former love: he urged me to promise that it should be enewed after the divorce from my sister was obtained. as shocked and terrified; and I told him that I would arrather marry any poor slave on his estate than I won He left me in a passion, and you came i marry him. It was then you—spoke to me." dose upon it.

"Ay, ay."

But I answered you very differently from the way in which I answered him, though the substance was the same," the said, glancing brightly up. "I was thankful to you, Mr. Leicester, gratified by your good opinion of me; and, in one sense, regretted so to answer you, for I had begun to value your friendship. I removed to your house the same afternoon."

"And I went up the country, on an improvised mis to rid you of my company. The time will come yet, $\mathbb{N}_0$ when we shall beguite our home evenings by talking these old days."

This remark results I Susan. When Mr. Carangle in England last year, he came here. What do you the for? To renew his prayer, that I would still best Mrs. Carangle. I quitted his presence, and sent Ursult answer him. She did it. That is all I have to telly Mr. Leicester."

"And why have you told it me, Susan > "

"It was right that you should know it. And began knowing it, you may not think of me as you did before."

"No. I do not: I think of you more highly. I rope Susan, I cannot see why you have told me this. Why shar your having been engaged to Mr. Carnagie render you'k eligible to become my wife?"

"Because my whole heart's love was given to him," standard, "Because, loving him as I did, ardead, enduringly, I can never love another. I esteem you, M. Ledeester—far more than I ever esteemed him; I like yo better than I like any one; better, probably, than I eve shall like any one, even if we do not meet again after the night. I feel a pride in your apright character. I long to your society; in the daytime I wish the hour, would more quickly pass on to evening, which may bring you; and pace in your presence, I am at rest, and look for nothing beyond it. Yet, for all this, I do not love you; my love passed from me with Charles Carmovie."

Mr. Leicester drew her face from the window, drew it owards him between his hands, and gazed on it. "What nore can I desire?" he asked. "My dearest, I will romise you one thing—never to be jedlous of the memory of Lieutenant Carmonia."

"You are willing to take me as I am, with my worn-out cart?"

"Ay, Susan I take you and be thankful."

"Then," she whispered, leaning forward to hide her carful face on his breast, "hear me also promise that I will se to you a good and faithful wife. You shall never have cause to regret that my early love was given to another."

"Susan, I must pay myself for that old refusal."

As you please."

"Frances," cried Bessy Ashley, dancing into the presence Frances Maithand, some days later, "I am going to be a idesmaid to somebody. You are going to be asked to be other. Ursula Chase is to be the third."

"Who is going to be married?"

"Ah! Who! I am right, after all. It is to be directly, efore the summer's over."

"Can't you speak out? Who is it?

" Susan Chase and Mr. Leicester."

"It's not true," said Frances, turning fifty colours.

"If it's not true, may I never be a bride myself," attered "Just pocket your nonsense, and behave to them as a decent young lady ought to behave. It will be: and you now what can't be cured must be endured."

Frances Maithand did pocket it, and was one of Susar

Shaso's bridesmaids on her wedding-day.

And Susan saw that destiny had been kinder to her tha she would have been to herself; for she knew that, as the wife of Churles Carnagie, her heart would have sought vain for the Romo it had now found in Mr. Leicester.

FRANCES MAITLAND'S ANGER.

"You are willing to take me as I am, with my worm-out mart ?"

"Ay, Susan! tuke you and be chankful."

"Then," she whispered, leaning forward to hide her aful face on his breast, " last me also promise that I will Ho you a good and faithful wife. You shall never lave and to regret that my early love was given to another." "Sasan, I must pay myself for that old refusal."

«As you please."

"Frances," eried Bessy Ashley, dancing into the presence f Frances Maitland, some days later, "I am going to be a sidesmaid to somebody. You are going to be asked to be mother. Ursula Chase is to be the third."

"Who is going to be married?"

It is to be directly, "Ah! Who! I am right, after all. glore the summer's over."

"Can't you speak out? Who is it?

"Susan Chase and Mr. Laderster."

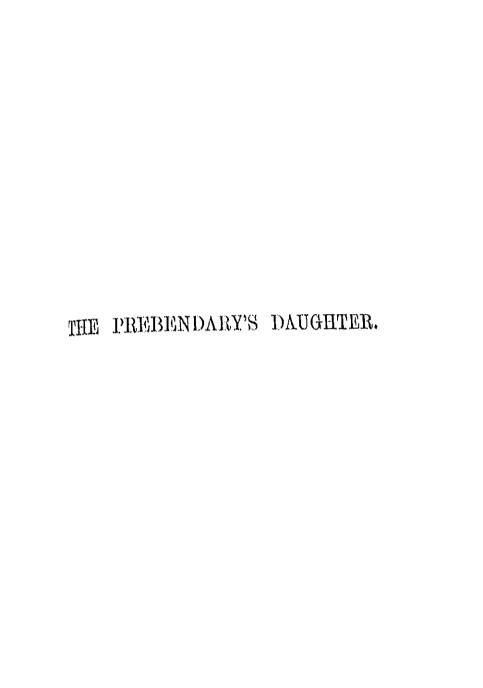

"It's not true," said Frances, turning tifty colours.

"If it's not true, may I never be a bride myself," attored Bessy. "Just packet your normense, and behave to them as adecent young lady ought to behave. It will be; and you know what can't be cured must be endured."

Frances Maithand did punket it, and was one of Susan

Chase's bridesmaids on her wedding-day.

And Susan saw that destiny had been kinder to her than she would have been to herself; for she knew that, as the wife of Churles Carmagie, her heart would have sought in vain for the home it had now found in Mr. Leicester,

HE PREBENDARY'S DAUGHTEI

CHAPTER L

THE LUNATIO ASYLUM.

a rural part of a well-known county of England, one casting a cathedral-town for its chief city, which city will call Closeford, there stands a red-brick building, ideous as Buckingham Palace in its style of architecture, and almost rivalling it in size. It seemed to have been will for strength, certainly not for ornament; and the aveller, as he gazes at its staring wings, its small windows, or the most part protected by apright iron bars, and then ces the luxuriant, well-kept acres of pleasure-grounds that arround it, halts on his road and inquires what the place arche.

"The Lunatic Asylmo."

One traveller, in riding past it many years ago, received his roply to his question, and upon hazarding further smarks, found he had unconsciously addressed himself to me of the resident surgeons. He learnt that the new-behinded system of rational and gentle treatment was pursued in it; and the conversation that ensued ended in his being invited to go over the establishment. It was an invitation that was gladly necepted, for, somewhat singular

"I have done nothing to her, ma'am. I have not spoke a cross word, or bid a finger on her. While I was gettin her ready, she suddenly demanded to have her lest thing put on, and because I did not comply, she flew into one there passions. Look at her bonnet here I with both the strings torn off; and if I had not got it from her she would have ripped it to pieces."

"I will have on my best thines, I will!" raved the year damsel, hestowing a few gratuitous kicks on the maid's leg "How dare she say I shan't? They are not hers."

"These oft-repeated scenes are most lamentable," bewalk Mr. Glynn, his usually quiet tones querulous with agitatio "I cannot think, nurse, but you must be in fault. Yo have not, perhaps, the knack of managing little ones, don't hear of other people's children being thrown into the distressing passions."

"I have repeatedly told you, nurse, that I cannot and we not have this," broke in Mra. Glynn, impetuously. "Yo must keep her calm, at any sacrifice. You know what if doctors say, that she is one of the most excitable childred living. She will be laid upon a sick bed, one of these day through your injudicious contradiction, and her heal rained."

"I have no objection to her putting on her best thing retorted the servant, rather sharply," but I know the stathey will be in for Sunday, if she does. She trails ale every dirty place she can find, and gets into the ponds, a tears through hedges, and it's beyond the power of a mortal man or woman to prevent her."

"Lavinia, my darling," cried Mrs. Olyan, with some sile suspicion that the nurse's words might prove true, and we so, "this frock is a very nice one—quite as pretty as yo new silk."

"It's a masty frook, it's an ugly frock!" squealed t ng lady, louder than ever, as she commenced a frantic ce about the room. "I'll tear it to pieces if you make wear it! I want my best frock, and my new hat."

My poor child! my sweet Lavinia!" uttered the disged father, "don't excite yourself in this fearful way.

I Mrs. Glynn, the child will have brain or! Why don't you give her what she wants?"

"Go with nurse, my precious, and have everything you nt," implored Mrs. (Hynn. "It is all her fault; she has business to contradict you."

so the young lady brought her dance and her sobs to standstill, and flew out of the room, followed by the endant.

"It is all that servant's fault t" ejaculated Mr. (Hynn. "Of course it is," assented his wife. "When the child's parly managed, she is a perfect little angel."

A very nice angel indeed !

"Well?" exclaimed a fellow-servant, looking out of the tehen, as the nurse and the little tyrant passed the door.

"The same as usual," cried the nurse, in an aside answer. She has got her will, and I am to change her clothes. But know what; every time that master and mistress give in their in this blind way, it is a nail in their own coffins, find if I don't tell you true!"

"I know I'd care her, if she was a child of mine," was be muttered answer. "I'd put her under the pump, when er fiery fits came on, and pump on her till she was cool."

Now this seems really occurred, word for word: and imilar ones had been occurring ever since the child's namey. Some will be inclined to ask, Is it possible that may parents can be found so enlips of solish? It is not may possible but certain, that the parents of her who is see called Lavinia Glynn were so; and there are such still a the world.

The child was maturally of strong passions; her love, I batred, her generosity, her vindictiveness, all were instremes; and she had an inordinate share of self-will, we are apt to term "obstinacy." This should be cheek in all children, but capecially in one like Lavinia (this should have been constantly checked from her carliyouth. Instead of which, it was festered by every possimeans.

By the time she was a few years older, the scenes passion and tears had ceased, for Lavinia carried her wis without them; and obsdience to her every whim was been much a matter of custom with her parents, that residues was never thought of.

It was attempted, however, once. Mr. and Mrs. (hy had gone to London for medical advice for the former, a was always ailing, and were staying at a private hotel Jermyn Street: Lavinia, who was then about fourteen, course went with them, for they would as soon think trying to fly as of stirring without her. It happened be Epsom race week; and, to their astonishment and plexity, Miss Lavinia announced her intention of "goldown to the Derby" in the company of some people without the had picked up a speaking acquaintanceship the same hotel. Mr. (flynn exhausted all his persuasi ineffectually, and finally told her she should not go.

Should not—to Lavinin? He might as well have to the tide not to flow on, as Canute once did. She flow to with a little of her old violence, and set him at defland declaring that neither he nor any one che should opper will. So, poor, weak man, he made a compromise; this, he tried to make it, and proposed to procure a carria and take her down to Epsem himself. But that did a do for Miss Lavinia; she should and she would go withose who had invited her; and the next morning Mr. it & Glynn had the satisfaction of seeing her get into the wded hired barouche of these strangers.

In the fruit! the fruit!—the fruit that an education, has this, must bring forth on a child! Mr. and Mrs. and lived to reap it. Better that God had taken her in sinless infancy.

CHAPTER III.

THE MEHRY.

THE storm was nearly over; and the sun, bursting for from the verge of the horizon, for it was near its settle caused the drops to glisten on the trees, and lighted upt hills in the distance. The clouds were disappearing fit the sky, leaving its deep blue visible, and giving promis now, of a calm night, whilst the sweet odour arising in the heated earth was inexpressibly refreshing. An ho before the scene had been different. Then, the clouds we lowering ominously, faint peak of thunder, quickly growing nearor, resounded in the still air, and heavy drops of m had commonced their descent on the trees. They fell ( the bare head of a gentleman, striding imputiontly to as fro: he had removed his hat, for it prossed his browheavi in the sultry heat, and he pushed back his waving hai wishing for a breath of wind to cool his brow. He wi young, probably three or four and twenty, of could presence, sufficiently attractive in feature and form, by the lines of his face spoke of dissipation, and of a wi that knew little bridling. It was a secluded spot, this, t which he confined his steps. Years ago it had been but young plantation, on the grounds of the nobleman who estate lay around, but the trees had towered up, in the might and strength, until now they rivalled those of man an older forest. A path lay through the wood and striking n the midst of this path on the right you came upon a ll, grassy opening in which was a sort of bower formed the trees, where rude seats had been placed. On the of the wood lay the seashere, but it could not be seen a that spot. It was in this green opening, so dark and uded that one penetrating to it might fancy himself es from the haunts of men, that the young man was ing, and an impatient exclamation at being kept waiting st more than once from his lips. But now there anced towards him, breaking from the dense trees, a m young and handsome, and the irritated expression this face and he started eagerly forward. It was that Lavinia Glynn.

But Lavinia Glynn grown up to womanhood. Look at r, reader: a fine girl, tall and graceful, with pale, statue- e features, impassioned in excitement, calm in repose: ads of raven hair shade her face, and in her jet-black a there is a flashing light, a brilliancy rarely seen in men of these more northern climes.

With the increase of years had increased Mr. Glynn's ments. He had latterly taken it into his head that orfolk did not suit him; was too damp, or too dry, or so something. So he sold his property there, and took a case for six months in a remote seaside village in Sussex. In the many than the contract of the contract

Who was he, this young man? She knew not. She had necentered him soon after their arrival at the village, in ne of her solitary walks on the beach. It may be that ach was mutually struck with the attractions of the other; t may be that the loneliness of the place banished from heir minds conventional forms and ceremonics, especially he common one of introduction; certain it is they got nto conversation, neither quite remembering afterwards which had made the first advance towards it. This one formal meeting had led to many others, and it was to many more.

It is impossible to describe the sentiment with whit Lavinia Glynn regarded Mr. Durham. They had now mevery day for five or six weeks, ay, more than once in ear day, and to designate the feeling which had grown up her heart for him by the name of love would be to expreit most inadequately. A more ungovernable passion now was indulged in: he had become to her all in all; if would have given up heaven at his bidding; father, mothers, kindred, all were to her now as nothing, company with this attractive stranger, who had arisen to usurp ever corner of her ill-regulated heart.

What could be expected of a girl brought up as Lavin Glynn? That she would carb this extravagant passio when she knew not whether he for whom it was entertaint was worthy or not?—that she would at least restrain within moderate bounds? How can you ask it? When child, in infancy, is allowed to include its every fane ordinate and inordinate, in childhood left uncontrolled, i girlhood unrestrained, how, think you, will it fare with the stronger passions of riper years?

Mr. Durham had told her nothing about himself. If may have been a reserved man by mature, though that of often a characteristic of youth, or he may have possessed one secret motive for not wishing her to know much a himself and his antecedents. All the information he is parted to her was, that his name was Durham, that he parents were dead, and that he was fresh from Cambridg University. What had brought him to this retired sca-cons village? she asked him one day. A love of roving was the reply. He had come to it one morning in holiday idlenes intending to remain a day, perhaps two, and then start of again; but—he saw her, and could not tour bimself await.

Moiont explanation for Lavinia, but perhaps certain ditors of the gentleman's could have given a different louring to his sojourn there, had they been so fortunate to learn the fact.

So their meetings had gone on unchecked, from the few staccidental ones on the seachere. There were scarcely styristers staying in the village, ten or twelve at the most, at these were middle-aged invalids, devoted to themselves ad to the recruiting of their own health. They had passed wage of romance, and it was nothing to them that a andsome girl and a stylish-looking man, both strangers, hould appear to be striking up a flirtation; should come pen each other, on the sands, at all sorts of odd hours, and saunter carelessly away together; now, further up the sach, as if in pursuit of breeze and sea-shells; now, back o the fields; and now, far away towards the forest, out of light and memory.

In one of their stolen walks they had come upon this recess in the wood, and, tired and heated, Lavinia had sat fown in it. Ah! it was better there than in those public promenudes, the wide sea-beach, the open fields, the broad wood-path; for Mr. Durham could hold in his that fair hand (which, by the way, was not fair, in the romantic acceptation of the term, for though it was delicate in colour, it had never been so in structure), and make love as much as he pleased, with little chance of being popped upon by any staring struggler. And to this spot their steps wer by tacit agreement henceforth directed, Mr. Durham growin, more devoted and Lavinia more passionately fond of hin day by day. But take you care, Laviula Glynn, that you go not once too often. It may be you know not the danger that may arise from these repeated solitary meetings, when you are alone with a careless, unprincipled man and the impetuosity of your own uncontrolled heart! It may be you do not know the fight in which a man of the non always looks upon one who can systematically decide he parents and outrage the usages of custom to be in is society; the little respect he can continue to feel for he It was an unfortunate thing that Mr. Glynn should be had, just at this time, a renewed attack of the disorders came to cure. Some days he did not go out at all; other only for a few minutes, leaning on his wife's arm. Lavid therefore, was at liberty to follow her own course. Out sionally, indeed, when her absences were unusually prolonge Mrs, Olymn questioned her as to how they were say "Reading on the heach," or some such plausible excus was the ready reply; and it was never questioned, 0 person, however, knew of these frequent meetings wit Mr. Durham. It was a woman-servant of Mrs. Glym Dobson, a maid who had not lived with them very long but who had wormed hers If into Lavinin's confidence She usually attended Lavinia in her walks -or was suppose to do so; and she entered into the spirit of this clandestic affair eagerly.

"My levely Lavinia!" exclaimed Mr. Durlam, as Mi Glynn came forwards from the trees, "I feared you would never come!"

"Oh, Arthur I" she uttered, "I thought I should have mad I. I knew you were waiting for me, and I could not get away, for I was kept reading to my father. Hathere been a fire in the room, I think I should have those the pamphlet into it."

"I imagined that the threatening storm had kept you, returned Mr. Durham. "It seems to be coming on quickly.

"The storm!" she thought. "If the clouds carried for I would joyfully walk through all if it were to lead me thin!—My mother is not well this evening, and is in bed, she said aloud, "and paper is so exacting."

of Durham's remark about the storm seemed soon to reffed. The lightning had become more frequent, more id, the thunder was nearer, and the rain fell faster. He set his arm round Lavinia, and drew her inside the set for shelter, under its intertwined roof of leaves and meles. She did not sit down, but stood at the entrance, king out. It may be questioned, however, if she saw heard the signs of the increasing storm; certainly she and heed them. She had no sight but for that form a side her, no thought but for that one idol. And had an agel's voice spoken and told her it was a worthless one, as would not have listened or cared.

So there they remained. Mr. Durham whispering all the simuting deceit that man knows so well how to whisper, and Lavinia drinking it in: not as poison, which she ought a have done, but as the very sweetest inceuse ever offered in the poison. And the storm soon raged in all its fury and strength.

CHAPTER IV.

A STERN SUMMORS.

The shades of night were gathering on the earth wher Lavinia Glynn drew near to her home. It was a solitary house, standing just outside the village, surrounded by a productive garden: grass, flowers, fruit and vegetables, all grew together in that well-kept, agreeable disorder ofter observable in small country tenements. A privet hedge onclosed it on two sides, in which there was a gate. If was not the front entrance, but Lavinia approached it went through, and was passing stealthily across the garden towards the side-door of the house, when some one darked out, in a crouching posture, from some high shrubs, and seized her by the arm. Lavinia, albeit a young lady to whom "nerves" were unknown, gave a startled cry. Ye it was only Dobson.

"Where in the world have you been, Miss Lavinia?" as her hurried salutation. "There has been the greates ampus: missis and master—— What is the matter?" broke off the servant, as she noticed her young lady more particularly, her strange and hurried appearance.

"I am not well," replied Miss Glynn; "I—I hastened through the rain, and I—I suppose I fainted and fell. am going straight to my room, and shall not come down again."

"You can't go up to your room till you have show erself," interrupted Dobson, authoritatively; and it may to be mentioned that Miss Glynn's confidential familiarity the her servant caused the servant to be familiar with r—a natural sequence, and one that is sure to follow. They have been sending all over the place, and I was red to hide myself out here, or muster would have seen, for he has been dodging in and out like one possessed. The tell you what it is, Miss Lavinia, if you are going to main out in this way, I can't undertake to cloak it with a pretence that you are out with me. I have been off a head with fright almost, stopping out here in the hatning and thunder."

"Has it thundered so much?" demanded Lavinia, vaguely.
"Have you been deaf or asleep?" asked the girl, looking her keenly. "It was the thunder that so frightened aster and missis: they thought we might be on the sands, the thick of it. Frightfully loud it was, too!"

"Yes, yes," cried Lavinia, hastily; "I forgot. It has yen me a headache, and I can think of nothing. I shall and sleep it off. Call me as usual in the morning."

But I tell you, you can't go till they have seen you," peated the servant. "Missis has rung the bell twenty mes, inquiring if we were come, and master's more nervous an he has been for months. I have heard it all from tro. Hark, he's inquiring again now! Where's Mr. barham?"

"Gone home, I suppose. I left him long ago. How do know? What a fuss papa's making! Go in, Dobson; we stopped on the beach, and that I am tired."

The beach won't do," bluntly retorted the servant; the butler went there, and came back and reported that here was not a soul all over it."

"Then make up a tale yourself," answered Lavinia, larting past the maid, "for I tell you I am not going to be questioned to-night. Say the thunder frightened in and I have gone to bed and can't be disturbed in anything."

For a short time these claudestine meetings contine to go on, and the bower to be a witness to many a lov yow, destined to be broken, as love yows for the most pare. Whilst they are in progress, let us give a word explanation about one of the two parties to them.

A few years previously, Arthur Durham by which a pollation we will continue, for the present, to designate his though in giving the name "Durham" to Lavinia (lly) he had given one that was not his own-became a freshing at Cambridge, His mother had died in his boyhood, at he had recently lost his father, a clergyman. The proper left to Arthur was very small- scarcely more than enoug to prepare him for the Church, to which he was likewi destined; for his father, though enjoying an excellent ben flee, was a free-living man, and spent in many ways whe he might have saved, Before Arthur had been that months at the university he was deep in everything the he ought to have kept out of lets, drink, rows, racing billiards, suppors, headaches, and a whole catalogue of othe evils, all helping him to become a parson in accordance with our system of education. Now Arthur Durham wa a handsome gentlemanly young fellow, a fascinating com anion, and stood high in university favour, not quite orhaps, with the deans and proctors, but with all th sets," high and low of his college, The consequence was that, instead of struggling resolutely out of the mud which was likely to smother him, as a poor man, he dive deeper into it with every term, until at last the state of hi affairs was obliged to be made known to his uncle, the brother of his late father, a rich man with an only son Very wroth, and more shocked than wroth was this good in, when he found that his nephew's substance had gone a way of all circulating metal, that he dared not walk out for fear of certain ominous taps on the shoulder, and at unless the more pressing claims on him were settled could not show his face again at Cambridge. But he is not so but an uncle, as uncles go, for though he beilled and lectured, and lectured and bewailed, making r. Arthur, as he foully hoped, repent to the very end his heartstrings, he ended by paying all the debts and do his nephew a sufficient allowance to keep him for the mainder of his terms. So back went my gentleman with ing colours, and in another year was as deep in tradesm's books as ever, and in others more pressing than iversity tradesmen's. Arthur Durham had not a bad art, and by nature he was not prolligate, but the prelent dissipation at the university, the reckless society he ked with there, drew him on, almost imperceptibly to mself. He did not like to approach his uncle a second he, and hence his sojourn at that obscure little wateringsee: for it was necessary to be out of the way until mething was done, though what that something would was a puzzle to himself. He found the place excesrely slow; his own account of it, in writing to a friend, is that he was "bored to death": perhaps that he did st quite leave it (and the world) for a better, was owing his pursuit of Lavinia Glynn. But gallant amusements ing quite "used-up" diversion at the university, Mr. urham still found himself "bored" considerably, and so desporate day he took heart and pen, and wrote a tter to his uncle full of self-contrition, promises for the ture, and prayers for assistance, all jumbled up together strong as the dictionary could make them.

The answer came: a stern summons. Mr. Arthur was dered to "come out of that disgraceful hiding" and appear forthwith before his uncle. If he lost four and twenty hours in doing so, the old gentleman allimed would not see or help him. And he was one to keep his wor

"Whew!" whistled Arthur, when he received the lette which arrived about ten days after the evening of the storm, "what will Lavinia say?"

What indeed! Mr. Ducham met her as usual that and broke the news to her. But, hoping more effectual to prevent remonstrance on her part, he said the summer was from his college.

"Oh, but you may not go! you must not go!" utter Lavinia, when the full import of the news broke upon h startled mind. "Arthur, you know you dare not go!"

O'There is one thing I dare not do," he replied, "me that is, disobey the mandate. You are not aware of a power these college proctors exercise over us, Lavinia, should be ruined for life if I refused to attend."

"You must refuse now," she impetuously reiterated you cannot leave me here alone. "I should die of grief

"Lavinia, my dearest, disobedience is an impossibilit and go I must. But you have no need to let it the affect you; for I tell you I shall be back the instant can get liberty."

"And our marriage?" she whispered.

"I am as anxious about all these things as you can be was Mr. Durham's reply. "Let me obey this summer and I will see what arrangements I can make."

"Where am I to write to you what address? I counct live now, in your absence, without writing and heard daily."

Mr. Durham hesitated: he had told her he was going Cambridge, and the reader knows he was not. Her questic puzzled him.

this confounded mandate may be for. The heads be going to rusticate me; and I should not like your is to fall into other hands. I will write, Lavinia."

Oh, go not away!" she resumed imploringly. "Last t I dreamt that you went, and the time went on—on—and you never returned! The dream was so like ty, that I have thought of it all day long with a lder. Oh, Arthur, go not away! Leave me not!" to soothed her into temporary calmness, into an uning acquiescence, and so departed.

t was late in the evening of the following day when hur Durham presented himself before his uncle at his atry residence. The old gentleman was pacing his ary, a handsome room, well stored with books. He ned sharply round when Arthur entered.

'So, sir," he said, darting unceremoniously into the ject, without preface or compliments, "what has become all your solemn promises of amendment that you made me in this very room?"

"Sir," oried Arthur, "I am deeply ashamed not to have at them."

"Can you advance one argument in defence of your graceful conduct?" he resumed sternly.

Arthur was silent: he knew that his uncle looked with lenient eye upon the thoughtless follies of youth, ways a bookworm, always, even in boyhood, in delicate alth, he had never himself yielded to their temptations, it could make no allowance for those who did. Marrying to in life a wife fond of retirement, he had seeluded asself ever since on this his ancestral estate, bringing up is only surviving child, Durham (a family name: the ason, probably, of Mr. Arthur's assuming it when he was fault for one), on a most strict, model plan. They don't ways answer, though, let them be ever so model.

"I can only advance one excuse, sir," observed Arthue the almost irresistible temptations that beset us at a university."

"There are no temptations, none that may not be a mounted," retorted the chier gentleman, calmly. "To a into debt, or keep out of it, is entirely at a man's or option. Durham has been at Oxford twelve months, a he is not in debt. He has not lived up to his allowing and he's younger than you by years."

Whatever may have been Arthur's faults, want of general feeling was not amongst them, and he remained siles. But it was within his knowledge that his cousin During was already souring a few kites in the air.

"Durham goes as a gentleman-commoner, with an amineome now, and a large fortune in prospective," he observe "I am known to be a poor man, who will have to get hereafter by my luck or my brains."

"If your last speech is intended by way of argument resumed the uncle, "I don't see how it bears upon t case. I should say it tells against you."

It certainly did.

"A very pretty career is yours, to lit you for one God's holy ministers! Pray, sir, which is deepest in yo thoughts—how you shall best get out of debt, or in divinity?"

"Why, sir, the university is not supposed to fit us for for—religion, and that sort of thing," replied Arthucandidly. "I suppose that comes with the ordination—it comes at all."

"You may well say 'if it comes at all!'" exclaimed the old man, pacing about in his restless manner. "It is the wretched training of our young divines that is helping pull down the Establishment. Oh, you may laugh! You don't think it is coming down? I can tell you, sir, the less a sweeping reform takes place, on more points than a in a century's time we shall all be dissenters. And Reformed Church will be left to take care of itself—hout its revenues, though," added the speaker, shrewdly.

*What an old cronker!" soliloquized Arthur.

How is a minister of God prepared for his holy office?

ware you being prepared?" he continued, wheeling and and facing his nephew. "You went to school, and re you were taught just as the other boys were taught, espective of future career: whether to be a soldier, a rson, a rake, no matter; the training was the same for . Then you went to the university, and what d'you there?"

"I only do as others do," deprecated Arthur.

"Just so; that's where it is. You learn to dress, and indle poor duns, and feast and drink, with graver vices at I will not put you to shame by naming. A few years this folly, each year growing worse than the last, and a present yourself to a bishop, he lays his hands on you, at you are turned out into the world to take care of her men's souls when you care nothing and know less out your own!"

"What a confounded old croaker!" thought Arthur ain.

"Well, there the system is, and I can't mend it, but I now what it will do for England. The people are bemaing enlightened, and, one by one, all abuses and anomas will be swept away."

"Meanwhile, what am I to do, sir, to avoid being swept may?" broke in Arthur, coming to the point. "Will you agive and assist me?" I promise, on my honour, it shall o for the last time."

"It would go against my conscience to aid in making in one of these graceless ministers, were it not that they are all alike," observed the old man, speaking raths solilonny than in answer. " How long is it before can be ready to take orders you

"About twelve months," was the roply.

" And in that twelve months, if I set you free now, will be us deep in debt as ever,"

"Sir, ngain I say I will pledge you my honour,"

" Honour amongst university students goes for what worth, I expect. I have no faith in it."

" What am I to say, sir ? "

" I think the less you say the latter, after all you asset once before. You are my brother's child, Arthur, as perhaps ought to give you one more trial. Get back college, hasten your studies there, and give me in the of your debts," a You are more generous than I deserve, sir silm expected," exclaimed the young man, the tears rushing

"Get yourself made a parson as speedily as you can and a choice specimen you'll make, to judge by the

"No worse than the generality of them sir," repli Arthur Durham.

It would seem that Lavinia (Hynn's dream had been pro photic, for Mr. Durham never returned. One letter can from him in the first week of his departure, which state that he was leaving Cambridge for the house of a relative and it was uncortain when he should return to the uni vorsity; but he would write again shortly.

He nover did write. And as the days, the weeks passed and there were no tidings from him, no sign of his turn, no proof even that he was still in existence, winia's state of mind was terrible. None can describe fierce, conflicting passions that waged war in it. She wild wander and watch through the livelong day, now using fiercely in their old resorts, now haunting the post-fiew with inquiries for letters, till that edifice began to hik her a troubled spirit, and now she would prostrate uself in that wide forest, in its dreary solitude, and call pon his name in her uncontrolled anguish, and cry out of him to come back to her. But he never came; he was ally proving himself another of those faithless cavaliers, whented in the song of the Baron of Mowbray," who wand ride away.

All that was all Lavinia Glynn's requital for her insanc riship. Very bitter, no doubt, but very natural.

CHAPTER V.

AT ARNIHOOK RECTORY,

A sunny country rectory. The windows of a small recopen to a verdant lawn, where the autumn flowers we blooming in clusters, under the genial learns of the morning sun, and a well-spread breakfast-table drawn to the window and waiting for its guests, presented a pleasant picture (English comfort.

The first to enter the room was a fair girl of winnig loveliness, the only child of the house, and the more precion parhaps, that two sisters had died in childhood. She can dancing in, her blue eyes sparkling, and the curbs of her ligh hair waving. Her features were of a charming delicate rarely seen, and her complexion was fair and bright. It was Maria Romar.

Dr. Remar came next, carrying his shovel lat. A tall pale man, with those abstracted books that one is apt to fancy characteristic of an intellectual elergyman, and a nervous restlessness of the hands. There was a considerable likeness between him and his daughter, but in complexion he was darker, his hair being of a fine brown. Mrs. Remar followed, and they sat down to breakfast.

The conversation turned chiefly upon one point: the approaching departure of Dr. Remar's curate. A painstaking, hard-working man, who had held the office under the three preceding rectors (these cathedral livings often hands), a'together for two-and-bwenty years, and is now rewarded with a substantial benefice of £150 per man. Dr. Remar was thinking how to replace him, and ss running over in his head all the lower fry of clergy mgregated in Closeford, the neighbouring cathedral town, then his man-servant entered with the letters.

Ambrook Rectory and village were situated about seven illes from Closeford, and this morning post was from that place only: the London letters, when there were any, came ome hours later in the day. Two letters and the county tempaper Andrew hild before his master. Dr. Remar put in his glasses -- he was near-sighted by nature, not with age Land opened one of the letters.

The doctor enught a glimpse of its contents : he looked at hosides, he looked at the middle, he looked at the beginping, he looked at the signature; and then the doctor turned ale and red by turns, and finally looked at his daughter.

"Maria, here's an offer of marriage for you!"

If the doctor was perturbed, she was not; and the amused, ill-anconscious glance she raised to her father proved that ler heart was as yet untouched.

"The epistle" (cough) -" is from my friend" - (cough, cough) - " what's the matter with my throat?" exclaimed the doctor; but the truth was, he was agitated. "Give me some more ten, Elizabeth—from my friend, Dr. Gore."

Maria laughed out unrestrainedly.

"Why, papa ! I like Dr. Gore very well as a prebendary, as your friend; but he is too old for me to marry! He is elder than you 1"

"He's on the verge of fifty," observed the doctor. "Nevertheless, my dear, he makes you a very handsome offer, and proposes an ample settlement. And he is our sub-dean 1"

6 t with results would leave Maria alone 1" exclaimed

Mrs. Remar, struggling between tears and previshing "This is the second officious offer she has had. She is a only child; why should they want to take her away from us?

"Dear mainma," whispered Maria, drawing her mother hand within hers, " be not afraid. I would rather be wit you and papa than with all the sub-deans in the Church,"

"What answer am I to make, Maria?" asked Dr. Rema

" You had better read the letter,"

"What you think lest, papa: anything civil, could not like old Dr. Gore. The next time I see him fear I shall laugh in his face,"

"You are too fond of laughing, Maria," rebuked the doctor. "You had better school yourself on that point, child."

Maria looked down, and compressed her lips, for she wa on the verge of transgressing then. And the canon unscale his other letter.

"Why, this is from the general post oh, I see-redirected on here from Closeford. Curacy vacant-title to orders -late father's friend creditable examination! Well, that's fortunate, and will save me the trouble of looking out, when I am just now so busy with my notes to the Divine Commentary, "

"What are you talking about?" asked Mrs. Remar.

"It's from my old tutor at Cambridge, inquiring if I can give or procure a title to orders for a pupil of his, the son of i deceased friend. A clever young man, he writes, and has passed a good examination. It will be the very thing! He can come here for twelve months."

"Then you must change again at the end of that period, a second trouble," urged Mrs. Remar.

"Not cortain. He may suit my views, and remain on for good. Glad to do it, perhaps. I don't suppose he is a young fellow with any interest: an orphan, Wilson says."

"What is the name?" aske! Mrs. Remar.

'Name? I do not know whether the letter mentions name. Oh yes, 'Chase.' Arthur Chase, Well, I shall wer this communication at once," concluded Dr. Remar, thoring up his papers and rising from the breakfast-table. "And the other one also, papa, if you please," said Maria. "The other one?" cried Dr. Remar, who, like most spirits to live within themselves, was remarkably forgetful and "Oh, true! I am sure I scarcely know what stracted. say. I fear the sub-dean will think you unpardonably sensible to merit, Maria."

"I dare say he will, papa."

Dr. Remur held a prebend's stall in Closeford Cathedral; ad, following prebendal custom, prepared in November to emove thither, with his family, for the audit season. Most mbendaries have a house contiguous to their cathedral, but Dr. Remar, with the exception of the month of November, during which the undit is held, and the four or five weeks he was in residence, generally made his home at Arnbrook Rectory.

All probondaries are supposed to lie under an obligation to reside in the immediate vicinity of their cathedral during four or five weeks in each year. During this period they ought to attend prayers in the cathedral once each day (not taking any portion of the duty), and to preach the sermon on Sunday mornings - that is, four or five sermons in allbut this latter duty they may delegate to a minor canon. No very arduous task, reader. I think you and I would hold a stall in a cathedral if we could get it. And for which they receive ... I don't like to say how much, for fear somebody should bring an action against me for libel.

Before Dr. Remar departed for Closeford, the new can Arthur Chase, arrived at the Rectory. The Reverend Arth Chase he was now, for the Bishop of Closeford had obliging put him through the necessary preliminaries. It was even ing when he arrived. He had taken the half-past five o'eld coach from Closeford, and was set down about half-past at the rectory-gate. Dr. and Mrs. Remar had strolled after their dinner, but Maxia was in the garden, and a him get off the coach. The young elergyman came up her, and introduced himself.

What most struck Maria was the remarkable contrast presented to their late curate. The Reverend Joseph lie was a meek, retiring man of six or seven and forty year very lumble, very silent, especially when in the presence his rector's family, and in person very plain. Maria never remembered him to have voluntarily addressed her but one and then he had called her "Miss." But look at the one now before her! A tall, elegant man, of great person attractions, whose hearing and manners were high-bred and refined, who conversed with her in a tone of the most perfect equality, who made himself, at once, the casy, agreeable companion, who was evidently quite as much at home in good society as she was, and who in short, to sum the matter up, who won her good will, off-hand.

Not only Maria's. The doctor and Mrs. Remar, the parishioners, the farmer and his family whose house was to be his home, for he had taken possession of the lodgings of the late curate, all were wonderfully taken with the roung minister. And when Sunday came and he preached a sermon, which, whether it was his own or not, was of persuasive cloquence, the opulent farmers openly congratulated the rector on his choice, and the latter imparted his satisfaction to his wife and daughter. But in this general congratulation none remembered that a persuasive volce and dequent tongue may belong to a lad man as well as a good me-minister of the Gospel though he be.

el shall ask him to come up and dine with as, after the geond service," said the rector to his wife, in the plenitude of his satisfaction.

Perhaps the rector had better have left it alone. Though how did he foresee, at that early stage, that the less Mr. Mase and Maria saw of each other, the better? He could not look into their hearts, and read the favourable impression which had been mutually made.

Not until next Saturday did Dr. Remar and his family eave for Closeford. But in that seven days Maria had been nore in the society of the new curate than she had been in hat of the old one in all her life. Not a day but he had nest part of it at the rectory, scarcely a day but he joined he Romar and Maria in their walks, the doctor being aried as usual in his study, up to his eyes in ink and lanuscripts. Now he was chattering to them whilst they brked, all sorts of pleasant anecdotes, tales of his collegefor of course he was careful what he said here-reminionces of his early home, another country-rectory, and of is lost but never-to-be-forgotten mother; unreserved mounts of his uncle, and his line property, and all he had one for him, for Mr. Chase made no secret that his own al been a thoughtless career, speaking of it in terms of merition. Now he would tie up flowers, and pluck the fing leaves off Mrs. Remar's plants; now he would come, nghing, up to the rectory, with a great quart stone bottle, om good Dame Giles, for some more "stuff for her inunatiz," as the late curate lad been wont to do, only that Withis shy modesty, would seek the supply from the houseoper, not from Mrs. Remar: now he would stroll forth in Banny afternoon with Mrs. Remar and Maria, to see and Introduced to some other house-confined dame; and in the evening he would be there making the tea-table pleasa and arousing the studious, abstracted rector to cheerfular Altogether, when, on the Saturday, Maria sat in the carrie on her way to Closeford, she may be pardoned for letipher thoughts run wild on the new and attractive companithey were leaving behind. They were to return to a rectory for Christmas, to remain; and Maria already wish the time had come.

CHAPTER VI.

DR. REMAR'S DECISION.

came: and it went. The clear, frosty month of January, e warmer but less fine February came in, each in its turn, al March arrived all blustering, but giving fair promise of lovely spring. How fared it by this time at Arnbrook ectory? Render, you have little need to ask. How is it kely to fare when two young and as yet unoccupied hearts ethrown into daily contact with each other? From the my first hour of their meeting, that twilight evening when what seen him get off the couch at the rectory-gate, the l-fated young lady's interest had been strongly excited words Mr. Chuse; and now that for some months they ad been brought into companionship, he ever by her side the plenitude of his manifold attractions, that interest ad deepened into love. Not the every-day sentiment which susually designated by the name, but the deep, all-absorbng passion that sets its stamp upon all the future life. The lements of powerful passion were in Maria Remar's nature, ad though they had hitherto lain in repose, subdued to almness by education and religion, they arose not the less istent now that their chords were touched.

And the Reverend Arthur Chase? Dissipated as his college-life had been, reckless as its course, heedless as he ad remained as to who suffered so that he obtained the ratification of the hour, whatever its nature might be, will it be believed that a chaste, pure love head now for the f time taken possession of his heart? Yet it had, on Maria Remar, and prayed that he might become wor of her. He glanced back at his former follies with loath and repentance; he sincerely hoped from henceforth tole a good life: was it that the "religion" hat "come" w his ordination, as he had once suggested to his uncle? don't know; but certain it is that he had now becomenny of the deep responsibility he had then a sumed in the sig of God. No man could more carne dly hope and design fulfil his duties for the future. To be a faithful and since Christian minister, and to some time call Maria Remarl wife, were now the aspirations of Arthur Chase. No ph declaration of love had passed from Mr. Chese to Maria,y the dear feelings of each were betrayed in a thousand way quite as nertainly as words could speak them. But, Heav bless Mr. Classe's innocence t wideawake as he was in the ways of the world, he little knew the nice distinctions of cathedral town, or he never could have admitted a hops the anything so obscure as a curate without definite prospectsand very definite ones, too! might dare to aspire to the daughter of Canon Remay,

A few weeks more, it was in April, and Dr. and Mr. Remar's optics were rent open. It may be a wonder to most people that they had remained shut so long: but, that one in the position of Mr. Chase could presume to think of Muria, never entered into the exclusive ideas of Dr. and Mr. Remar. To them he was but the lowly curate; a clergyman is is true, but one east in quite another aphere; the successor to the shy, humble drudge, who would have been is likely to raise his eyes to royalty for a wife as to the offshoot of a prebendary. If you think these distinctions were not held and recognized amongst certain of the clergy, at the time of which I am writing, you are extremely inexperienced what regarded them, and I am now telling you no tale of

The way in which it came out was very shocking : everyally said so. The doctor had an attack of something he ad gout, and his wife said rhoumatism-but, whatever it st it caused him to keep his bedroom, and diet himself. The was a nervous man in illness. One evening Mrs. emar, who had been sitting with him, came creeping down the breakfast-room for her knitting, which she only orked at by twilight. She had on list shoes, not to disturb n invalid, who could not bear the least noise when he hought himself ill, and, pushing open the room door, quietly stered. Horror of horrors ! there stood Mr. Chase and faria just outside the window; his arm was round her aist, his hand chaped hers, and he was whispering perlasively to her in the fading light, their attitude being hmistakably that of lovers. Of course it was very dreadful we all know it, that is, if we are elderly-and Mrs. Remar and transfixed: had she witnessed a bear's paw round her fighter's waist, she would not have been quite so much looked. She uttered an involuntary exclamation, which used Mr. Ohnse to start and release Maria; and the red food rushed over his handsome face.

He could do nothing else than speak out; which he did honce; all his love; all his hopes; how tenderly he was tached to Maria, how fervently he trusted some day to ske her his wife. Mrs. Remar would have preferred, of two, to hear he was attached to her. She was too angry, dismayed, to reply. Of impassible general temperament, was capable, like Maria, of being aroused to great exciteent, and she flew upstairs to Dr. Remar.

The doctor, for some time, could not make out what was a disturbance, for with her frantic lamentations and storical sobs, his wife was partly unintelligible. But when he did comprehend the matter, he tumbled out of b with as little ceremony as any doctor of divinity of tumbled out yet, and, forgetting his gout and his rheumatic thrust a portion of his clothes over his night attire, and so his wife to order up Mr. Classe.

When the young elergyman entered, all agitated thou he was, the appearance of his rector struck him as bet somewhat hadicrons. The doctor had been startled out of doze, that light sleep which is apt to steal over invalidate the daylight fades, and he looked but half awake; his far paler even than usual, and his long hair standing on on just as if he had been drawn through a hedge. Dr. Rom had been accused of affectation in thus wearing his his longer than was customary, but those who were prone to so know little of him; careleseness, inattention to persof appearance, had to do with the limbit, not affectation. I was struggling into a waistcoat when Mr. Chase entered, a down he sat in his night-shirt sleeves.

In vain Mr. Chase offered explanations. Dr. Remarcon not understand them: he really could not. His mind refus to take in the fact that it was within the range of possibili for an unknown deacon to fall in love with a Miss Remark

"Are you in the full possession of your senses, sir?"] demanded at length, after listening to what Arthur had toss

"Why, yes, sir, I hops so," deprecated Mr. Chase,

"It seems to me not," retorted the rector; "or else the you are forgetting all ideas of social decency, a more representation of the state of the second decency, a more representation of the second decency, a more representation of the second decency and that I am Prehendary Remarks."

"I am of good family, sir, as you are aware," suggested the young elergyman. "And though it would appear unseem for me to aspire to Miss Remar under my present circum.

As Mr. Classe descended the stairs he came upon Mar She was lingering in the recess leading to the breakfast-redoor, the rays of the bull home falling aslant her da Terrified, sick and shivering, she had been dreading termination of the interview. He pushed open the redoor, drew her in, and clasped her to his heart.

"Oh, Arthur! What hope is there?"

"None, Maria, for the present," he answered; and put aside her clustering curls, and held her pale changainst his. "Your father is bitterly against it: it is a less for me to conceal it, for you had better learn the tafrom me, my darling, than from him. In honour, Ma I nught not to be with you; and we may not again meet

A low, wailing cry of pain burst from her.

"I may not fetter you by vows, Maria," he resumed: dare not, in honour, speak to you of hope for the futs Yet in my own heart hope is strong: it whispers that coparation will not be for always, though we must part; a time. God bless you and keep you, my dearest, at that time shall come! And should it never come.

He stopped in agitation: he could not speak calmy that probability. The tears were streaming from Mad eyes, and she cling to him in the bitter overwhelming despair. But Mr. Chase knew that he was transgress in thus prolonging their interview: honour was alive will him now, however dead it might once have been, and we a briof, fervent embrace, a passionate straining of her his beating heart, he turned to the half door and passed of it. Maria chaped her bands together, watching through the glass doors the last of that form which had become necessary to her existence. But at that moment she her her father's voice calling harshly to her. "It will keep!" she murmured, as she turned to obey.

A good thing if it had blue teen

OHAPTER VII.

" MAY I NOT HOPE?"

is months went on to autumn. At the window of her essing-room, in the probendal residence at Closeford, ich window by way of prospect had the cathedral walls d some restless rooks that were always flying about and wing, sat Maria Remar, her weakened frame propped up th pillows, and the hectic of some disorder that looked ry like consumption deepening her check and glistening r oye.

The events of the previous April had been too much for r. The forced separation from Arthur Chase had impaired r health and strength. Dr. and Mrs. Remar had pointed # to her the impossibility of her ever seeing him more, id to guard against that event happening accidentally, sho as at once removed to Closeford. She bowed to the will her parents: she was by far too dutiful a child, had been o correctly brought up, to attempt to see or hear from r. Chase claudestinely; but the incessant struggle going a within her, the aching misery that filled her heart, the lence in which she buried her inward life, told upon her, dily health. No particular disease fell over her; nothing cept debility; but when the weeks and months were on, ad she grew worse day by day, the frame weaker, the heck brighter, the face and hands more attenuated, then cople said that Maria Remar was dying. Oh, it was a fearful time for Dr. Remar! To sacrifice his cheris pride and suffer his daughter to descend in the scale "society," and become one with that poor, obscure cum or to see her die before his eyes! He had to choose one the two alternatives. But the prejudices of a probenda at least such a one as Dr. Remar, when were they or come? His were not; for they formed part and parcel himself. It was asserted, in the precincts, that Mrs. Ren went down upon her knees to her husband, bescooling h to relent and to save their child. But this may not ha been true. It is cortain that Mrs. Remar was overwhelm with grief, grief so excessive that it could not be restrain before her friends and visitors, though she only spoke them of Maria's illness, never of its cause, or hinting at M Chase. But there was no relenting on the canon's par for his curate remained unsummoned and unneticed Arnbrook, and Maria grew daily nearer to the grave, may be that Dr. Remar did not take this sombre view her case, that he thought time would suffice to restore he to health, or that some mirede would be wrought upon he

One day, about eleven o'clock, Dr. Remar, with his as abstracted air and restless step, was leaving the cathedrafter morning prayers, when, as he emerged from the cloisters, his servant, old Andrew, stepped up to him.

"A gentleman has been waiting to see you almost eve since ten o'clock, sir," he observed. "Mr. Chase."

2 Blo 22 cried Dr. Remar, arousing himself.

"Mr. Chase, from Arnbrook," repeated Andrew. "His in the study, sir,"

"The insolence—the presuming insolence of the fellow to intrude into my very house t" muttered Dr. Remar striding on briskly. "It is well for him his twelvemonth is nearly up."

He went in with the sternest possible expression of face, this brown hair straggling about more than ever : it meliow had a knack of doing so, if anything put him out. t his visitor came forward to greet him with a bright ile and beaming glance.

"Insolent !" muttered the canon again. "To what am jadebted for this unexpected visit?" he haughtily inged, vouchsuling no previous courtesy of words, and anding bolt upright near the door.

"I have come to ask for a few days' leave of absence, "Yesterday afternoon's post to replied the curate. pught me some most unexpected news. My poor cousin burham Chase, has met with an accidental death, boating at pford; and my uncle has summoned me to his presence sithout delay."

"Without reference to my convenience, I suppose," oberved the stately probandary.

Winder the circumstances, Dr. Remar, I hope you will good it to me. There may be business to be gone through LI don't know. I am the heir, now."

"What?" oried Dr. Remur, a little more briskly.

"The heir to the family estates and to Durham Park. ly uncle has no other child living. God knows I sincerely gieve for my poor cousin ; but -but in the midst of it, Dr. Bemar, there is a thought that will intrude—that—_"

"That what, sir?" interrupted the doctor, putting a sudden stop to his curate's hesitation.

"It does not become me to speak of these matters with my consin yet unburied, but .-- mmy I not hope," he conioued, still a little hesitatingly, and his fair features flushing, "that with this worderful change in my prospects I may be allowed, on my return, to see Miss Remar? I hear, sir, sho is fearfully ill."

"Miss Remar is not in robust health," replied the doctor "But-to bring our present interview to a close-I wil accord you the leave of absence you require, in considerable of the melancholy circumstances under which it is demanded that present my compliments and condolence to Mr. Char.

The last sentence was quite sufficient—at least Arth thought it so—to give promise that the heir to the bro lands of Durham, even though he did aspire to the hand Miss Romar, would be received on a very different footifrom that on which the poor carate had been.

And so it proved. On Arthur's return he made proposals in due form, backed by the offer of a handso settlement, and was admitted to an interview with Maria.

Only just before it took place, on the same morning, he she learnt from her mother the change in her prospects the was painfully agitated when he entered, and he scare less so at witnessing the fearful change that a few montmental disease had wrought. No words, at the mome passed between them, but as the door closed behind? Chase and he advanced towards her, Maria rose into standing posture, and staggering a few steps forward, fainly as he caught her.

CHAPTER VIII.

NEMESIS.

In must now go back to Lavinia Olynn.

She was staying, when we last saw her, at that quiet little a-const town in Sussex. Not many weeks after the dearture of him whom she only knew by the name of urham, Mr. and Mrs. Olynn, fidgety as ever, discovered at the sesside did not agree with them any more than larfolk had done, and they removed from it, and took up heir final abode in London. But what a life was Lavinia's ! fer whole thoughts, wild and unsubdued as they had always con were concentred upon him whom she had set up in er heart to worship. As the months dragged their slow migth along, and he never come or sent her word or token, he anguish of her reflections deepened into despair, but geh despuir that the calm mind can form no idea of. light and day, night and day, she had no rest, or if she lid, of sheer nature's weariness, sink into a troubled sleep, or dreams but renewed her waking misery by portraying he form of Mr. Durhum.

It certainly cannot be necessary to explain here that arthur Durham and Arthur Chase were one and the same person, for that the reader has long ago divined; but I may be essential to add a fact of which he as yet knows nothing, namely, that Mrs. Remar was the sister of Mr. Glynn. Very little intercourse had been kept up between the families, living, as they did, widely apart; but when so important an event as the marriage of Maria drew on, the doctor and Mrs. Remar thought it right to recognize more closely the relationship, and they forwarded, quite at the cloventh hour, an invitation to the Glynns to visit Arabrook for the ceremony.

How can we describe the change which had taken place in Maria? Reader, you have shivered through a dark, tempestuous night, on which no ray of light has gleamed to relieve the howling wind, the territic storm, and watched if give place to the joy of morning, to the rising sun, the opening flowers, the dewy grass, the sweet carolling of the birds, and you have marvelled at the change. Even so was that wrought in Maria Remar.

The winter months had been apont by her in a trance of happiness, for they were again at Arnbrook Rectory, and Mr. Chase, who retained his curacy, was at her side. Her sweet face was now radiant with hope, and surely never did a union appear to advance under more genial anspices that that of hers with Arthur Chase. The marriage was to take place in April, and, after a temporary absence, they were to return und take possession of the Rectory House, Dr. and Mrs. Remur making their future home at Closeford. There was no necessity now, in relation to pecuniary matters, for Mr. Chase to remain in the Church, for his fortune would be abundant, but he preferred to do so. The hadable, it may be said serious, sentiments which had latterly grown up in his heart, were not bessened by his accession to wealth.

"Glynn? Glynn?" he exclaimed, the name of these new relations, new to, him, grating on his ear; "of what county are they?"

"No particular county that I know of," replied Maria. "They reside in London."

"London, do they?" he rejoined, with a sigh of relief.

Why?" asked Maria. "Did you recognize the name?" 'Yes. A—college friend—of mine was named Glynn:" You may well blush, Reverend Arthur, and draw that is fair face to yours, for it is a blush that you don't care should penetrate. But it wants searce a week now to weedding, and they have other things than names to talk out. Especially as Mr. Chuse was going away that ening for several days.

"We will not go," decided Lavinia, upon the arrival of a invitation. "What are the Remars to us? Or this gate!" The old habit, you see, reader, of consulting her an imperious will: and Mr. and Mrs. Glynn acceded assively. They had never yet done otherwise. But the mid, Dobson, the former dangerous confident; was avinia's confident still, and she urged her young mistress a reverse her determination.

"Mr. Durham," argued Dobson, and the colour rushed folently to Lavinia's face, as it always did at the mention of that name, "never comes to seek you, he never means at and, were he so inclined, he has no clue to where we see living."

Lavinia listened impatiently.

"It seems to me, then, that if you care to find him you must go out into the world. You may drop upon him in some odd corner of it. And if not, any change for you, Miss Lavinia, must be beneficial; rather than you should continue in this dead-alive state, without hope, without energy, your very life buried in the past !"

"Then let us got" exclaimed Lavinia, one of the ideas suggested serving to arouse her from her apathy. It is probable, however, that the servant had only spoken interestedly: she may have had no objection to vary the monotony of her life by a country excursion, "Get over the preparations as quickly as you can, Dobson," continued

Lavinia; "we will go into Closefordshire." And Mr. at Mrs, Glynn once more bowed to her redecision

It wanted but three days to the marriage when the family arrived at Arnbrook Rectory.

"How thin and pale you are!" exclaimed Maria to h cousin, when they were growing sociable. "I had alway pictured you as being so different the very image of healt You must have altered of late years,"

"Perhaps I have," returned Lavinia, crimsoning violently "I don't know. But tell me of your future husband Maria. Is he handsome? What is his name?

" Arthur," replied Miss Remur, passing by the first question

"Arthur?" almost serenmed Lavinia.

"What is the matter?" raid Maria. "Do you not like the name ?"

"Do I not like it!" numbered Lavinia to herself, he eyes filling with tears: " what other name can to me bring its charm with it?"

The day preceding the wedding arrived, and Mr. Chose had not returned, but he was expected by the evening coach from Closeford. An afternoon stage brought certain paraphermalia connected with the approaching ceremony; to wit, the wrenth that Maria was to wear, and the bonnet for Mrs. Remar. The young ladies caperly took up the wreath; when it was discovered that by some strange oversight (the wrong wreath probably forwarded) orange blossoms had been omitted in its construction.

"There is no time to send it back," observed Mrs. Remar; "we must go to the milliner's in the village and get a few sprays from her to mix with the wreath. She told me today she had some fresh ones."

"Poor thing I" exclaimed Maria. "I duresay she ordered them on purpose, heping we might want some Buy them all, manima,"

"Accordingly, when dinner was over, the two elder ladies not their way to the village after these orange blossoms, saving Dr. Remar and Mr. Hynn at the desert-table, and lavinia and Maria in the drawing-room. Maria took the steath out of the box, and began pulling out a spray here and there to make room for the additional ones she would have to put in.

Just at that time Dobson was in the kitchen gossiping sith the cook, whom the evening stage from Closeford, the very one which had first brought Arthur Chase to the house, drew up to the rectory-gate. Dobson started from her seat and rushed to the window.

als not that Mr. Durham ?" she exclaimed.

The cook ranged her eyes round the landscape, and rang them again before she unswered. "I don't see nobody by Mr. Chase."

"There! that gentleman coming up to the house. Heaving the path and crossing the lawn. It is surely Darham."

"That is Mr. Clarse, I tell you," cried the cook. "H going in through the breakfast-room windows; he of. does."

"What does he want here?" demanded Dobson.

"Want here!" retorted the cook: "why, that's Mic Maria's bridegroom."

"Heaven be good to me!" exclaimed Dobson, startlingly, "you don't mean to tell me it is that man who is to marry Miss Remar?"

Without waiting for any answer, she ran swiftly from the spartment, the cook looking after her in amazement, and remarking that the girl must be "gone crazy" in the head

Dobson came up with Mr. Chase as he entered the breakfast-room by the window, the pleasant apartment which the reader was first introduced to at Arabrook Rectory.

The room had two doors to it, one leading to the hall, the other opening to the dining-room. This latter door was ajor, and Dr. Remar and Mr. Glynn, who were within could hear every word that passed. Dobson had run & quickly that her breath was gone, and, without speaking she seized Mr. Classe by the artn.

"Ah white you, Dobson!" he ejaculated, his equinimity slightly shaken. "What brings you here?"

" My better angel, I trust," replied the woman, who, while ever her faults, was attached to Lavinia Glynn, "I should rather ask what brings you here, Mr. Durham, when you ought long ago to have been with Miss Lavinia."

"My good woman, don't talk so loud. All that is past and gone."

"Past and gone for you, sir, but not for her. You know well that you gained her whole love and solemnly vowed to · marry her, and that you ought to marry her."

and truth is I was wild and young and carcless, and I did talk nonsense to Miss Glynn. I um sorry, and, were the time to come over again, I would not do so; but it can't be helped now. Loose my arm, Dobson."

" Not till you promise to make her reparation, Tulked nonsense, indeed 1"

"I know of none that I can make," answered Mr. Chase, essaying to free his arm, without violence, from Dobson. But the woman's grasp was strong and determined.

There is only one way, sir marriage; keep to your promise and marry her. You can do that."

"Don't talk nonsense t" he exclaimed angrily. "Release your hold, Dobson, or you will compel me to use force."

"They say you are about to marry her cousin, Miss Remar,"

."Her consin !" be cried aglast.

" Yes; her own consin. And now, sir, if you persist in sk I swear I will stop the marriage. You must marry is Lavinia, and no one else."

"Absurd 1" he uttered houghtily, his temper rising, as swrenched his arm from her. "Lavinia Glynn is no ing wife for me."

Dobson was silent, perhaps Mr. Chase thought silenced, at he left a bank-note in her hand as he turned from the one However potent its influence might have been at disary times, Dobson flung it to the floor now. Had she on aware of its value, she might have treated it with less islain.

Mr. Chase went upstairs and entered the drawing-room, it following, walked Mrs. Remar and Mrs. Glynn, who id just returned. In the obscurity of the fading day, he is not recognize Lacrinia Glynn, but advanced to Maria, id stole a greeting.

But Lavinia knew him, and all sense of outward objects, wing himself, seemed to leave her. A mist rose before creyes, the room swam round, consciousness of those in it ded from her remembrance, and she fell at his feet with a spof pain, and clasped his knees in her wild, ungovernable spetuosity.

"Oh, Arthur I my love I my promised husband! I hought you would never come! How could you desert me and leave me to these years of dreadful despair?"

"What mistake is this?" broke from the dismayed lips of Mrs. Remar. "Is not this gentleman a stranger to you, favinis?"

Marthur, dearest, speak to them I" she implored; "telhem we are no strangers. Would we had been I" What Mr. Clause was about to stammer forth in explanaion he alone can tell; but Mr. Glynn now entored the room and strode forward, his voice raised in passion. conversation you have just held with a person in the bra fast-room had reference to this young lady, Miss Glyant

"He knows it had," cried Dobson, advancing to behind and giving vent to her anger. "Deny it if ; dare, Mr. Durham?"

"I met with this young lady two years ago, and—a—f nonsensical love-passages passed between us, nothing near stammered the young clergyman from between his livid. He, perhaps, was as anxious to save her reputation as exculpate himself.

"Liar!" uttered Dobson, confronting him. "Man never stir from this spot," she vehemently added, address those around, "if he did not win her love and confident and promise to marry her by all the most sacred vows the sight of heaven; and she believed him, and has jaken breaking her heart for him ever since. But he we not Mr. Chase; he called himself Durham then!"

There was a dead silence. Lavinia had buried her has at the feet of Mr. Chase, and he looked ready to go into the next world, he was so agitated and ghastly. Dr. Resal spoke up.

"Sir," he said, pointing to Lavinia, " are you preparel a surry this young lady?"

"My sins are being heavily visited upon me," murmerate the unhappy young man. "I——"

"No subterfuge, sir," thundered forth the rector. "I demand a plain answer."

"I cannot marry her," he replied, turning from the fall z girl with a shudder. "I can marry none save her who sa about to become my dear wife."

"And that you shall never do!" said Prebendary Remarks Some one thought then of looking round for Maria. She was standing behind, laughing, though the laugh seemed

MR. CASTONEL.

CHAPTER L

THE BEAUTIES OF EBURY

n unusual sensation was created one day in the village of hary, by a report that somebody had taken the long-ninhabited house, with the stone balcony and green grandah, which was situated in the centre of the street.

Who could have hired it? The whole village was asking be question one of another. Those cousins of the Smiths, of the people who had come on a visit to the Hall, and professed to like Ebury so well? No, none of these. It was a stranger from London, quite unknown to every one, for there soon appeared a shining zine plate on the newly-variabled oak door, hearing in large, very prominent letters, Mr. Gervase Castonel. Consulting Surgeon."

Ebury was in cestasies. A fashionable doctor was what the place wanted above all things; as to Winnington, he was nothing but an apothecary, old now and stupid. Only three days before, so the tale went round the whist-tables, when he was called in to Mrs. Major Acre, an elderly dowager, he had the insolence to tell her he could do her little good; that if she would cat less and walk more, she would good; that if she would cat less and walk more, she would good; want a doctor. They had put up with Winnington, who could not pay. Mr. Castonel had made an ostentation announcement that he should give advice gratis from his to ten o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays, but the few pot who accepted the invitation found him so repellent and w sympathizing that they were thankful to return to kind of Mr. Winnington, who had not only attended them withou charge at their own homes, but had done much towns supplying their bodily wants also. Mr. Winnington ha been neglectful of gain : perhaps his having no family his rendered him so. He had never married, he and his siste having always lived together; but just before her death, nièce, Caroline Ibill, then left an orphan, came home t them. To describe his affection for this girl would be if possible: it may be questioned if Caroline returned it as i deserved but when is the love of the aged for the youn ever repaid in kind? The pleasure and delights of visiting filled her heart, and her uncle's home and society wer only regarded as things to be escaped from. Was he ye awake to this? There was something worse for him to awake to; by and by, something that as yet he suspects not. He was much changed: had been changing ever size the establishment in Ebury of Mr. Castonel: his face had acquired a grey tinge like his hair, his merry tongue wa hushed, and people said be tooked as if his heart wer breaking. It is hard to hear ingratitude: ingratitude from those with whom we have lived for sixty years. It was not ir the value of the practice; no, no ; he lind that which ould last him his life, and leave something behind him: at it was the unkindness that was telling upon Mr. Winnington, the desertion for a stranger, one in reality less skilled than he was.

Frances Chavasse stood in her mother's drawing-room and, with her, the daughter of the Rector of Ebury, the Revorend Christopher Leicester Ellen Leicester had come in after dinner to spend the afternoon with Frances; for they, though it called itself an aristocratic place, usually laced in the middle of the day. They were both lovely july, about mineteen, though unlike in feature as in dissistion. They were called the beauties of Ebury. Caroline fall got classed with them also, but it arose from her sustantly associating with them, not from her good looks. The was two or three years older, had a sallow face with dark sair, and lively, pleasant dark eyes. An absurd story had gone abroad, but died away again: that Mr. Castonel, upon king asked which of the three was most to his taste, replied that only two of them were, but he'd marry the three for all late.

The two young ladies were talking eagerly, for Mrs Major Acre had just paid them a visit, and disclosed a piec of intelligence which completely astounded her hearers that Miss Hall was about to be married to Mr. Castonel.

"It is impossible that it can be true," Mrs. Chavasse her daughter had exchained in the same quick, positioger tones, for they were the counterpart of each oth manner. "Old Winnington hates Mr. Castonel like poison 1"

"I know he does. And I was told it was for that very reason Mr. Castonel is bent upon having her," said Mrs. Major; "that he may mortify the old apothecary, and take from him the only treasure he has left—Caroline."

"Oh, that's all Ebury gossip," decided Mrs. Chavasse.
"A well-established man like Mr. Castonel will take care to marry according to his fancy, not to gratify pique. Mr.
Wimnington will never give his consent."

"He has given it," answered the major's widow. "Caroline's will is law, there. I wish she may find it so in her new home."

"Well," added Mrs. Clawasse, dubiously, "I don't know that Mr. Castonel is altogether the man I should choose give a daughter to. Such curious things are said of him about that mysterious person, you know."

"Grapes are sour," thought Mrs. Major Acre to hersel "And now I have told you the news, I must go," sl said, rising. "Good-bye to you all. My compliments the parsonage, my dear Miss Ellen."

Mrs. Chavasse went out with the hady, and it bappens that immediately afterwards Caroline Hall entered. Elle and Frances regarded her with a curiosity they had never yet manifested, and Frances spoke impulsively.

O'How sly you were over it, Caroline! Now, don't pretend to deny it, or you'll put me in a temper. We know all about it, just as much as yourself. If you chose to keep it from others, you might have told Ellen and me.

"How could I tell you what I did not know myself?"

"Nay, Caroline, you must have known it," interposed the sweet, gentle voice of Ellen Leicester.

"I did not know I was going to be married. You might have seen there was "sake hesitated, and blashed an attachment between myself and Mr. Cestonel, if your eyes had been open."

"I declare I never saw anything that could cause me to think he was attached to you," abruptly attered Miss Chavasse, looking at her.

"Nor I," repeated Ellen Leicester. And the young ladies spoke truly.

"I may have seen you talking together in evening society, perhaps even gone the length of a little dash of flirtation," said Miss Chavasse. "But what has that to do with marriage? Everybody flirts. I shall have a dozen flirtations before I settle down to marry."

"That all depends upon the disposition," returned Miss-Hall. "You may; but Ellen Laicentee Ellen dare not," laughed Frances. "She would draw on the old walls of the parsonage about her ears if she mitted so beinous a sin. But I must return to what I d. Caroline, that it was nufriendly not to let us know it." "The puzzle is, how you know it now," observed Caroe. "The interview, when Mr. Custonel asked my uncle tme, only took place last night, and I have not spoken it to any one."

"Oh, news travels fast enough in Ebury," answered " If I were to cut my finger now with ances, carelessly. is penknife, every house would know it before to-night Ir Winnington may have mentioned it."

"I am quite sure that it has not passed his lips."

"Then the report must have come from Mr. Castonel 1" zelaimed Frances. "How very strange !"

"My uncle is not well to-day," added Miss Hall, "ar He has a great fire made up in a as seen no one. imwing-room, and is stewing himself close to it. nom's as hot as an oven."

"A fire this weather!" repeated Frances. "What ematter with him?"

"Nothing particular that I know of. He sits and sight d never speaks. He only spoke once between breakfas ad dinner: and that was to ask me if I felt Mr. Casto as a man calculated to make me happy. Of course he "Caroline," whispered Miss Leicester, "do you not :

tis your marriage that is preying on his spirits?" "I know it is. He would not consent for a long wh The interview was anything but agreeable. He and A Castonel were together at first, and then I was called in At last he gave it. Hut he does not like Mr. Castonel. appose from his having taken his practice from him."

"A very good reason too," said Miss Chavasse, bluntly. Oh, I don't know," carelessly returned Caroline. "It is all luck in this world. If people persist in sending 1 Gervase, he can't refuse to go. My uncle is old now," Ellen Leicester looked up, reproach seated in her de blue eyes. But Caroline Hall resumed :

"It is more than dislike that he has taken to Mr. G. tonel; it is prejudice. He cried like a child after Gerra had gone, saying he would rather I had chosen any one of in the world, he had rather I kept single for life, the marry Mr. Castonel. And Muff says she heard him sighin and groaning on his pillow all night long,"

"And oh, Caroline," exclaimed Ellen Leicester, in shocke hushed tones, "can you think of marrying him now?"

"My uncle has consented," said Caroline, evasively,

"Yes; but in what way? If you have any spark ( dutiful feeling, you will now prove your gratitude to you uncle for all his love and care of you."

" Prove it how?"

" By giving up Mr. Castonel."

Caroline Hall turned and looked at her, then spoke impressively. "It is easy to talk, Ellen, but when the time comes for you to love, and should be be unacceptable to your paronts, you will then understand how impossible is what you ask of me. That calamity may come."

"Never," was the almost scornful reply of Miss Leicester My father and mother's wishes will ever be first with me.

"Ltell you you know nothing about it," repeated Care tine. "Remember my words hereafter."

"Do not cavil about what you will never agree upon," interrupted Miss Chavasse. "When is the wedding to be Caroline 2"

"I suppose almost immediately. So Mr. Castonel wishes,"

"He is not so great a favourite in the place as he was when he first came. People also say that he is a general admirer. So take care. Caralina v

"I know few people with whom he is not a favourite," torted Caroline, warmly. " My uncle is one : Mr. Leicester, believe, is another. Are there any more?"

"You need not take me up so sharply," laughed Frances. I only repeated what I have heard. Take your things off, aroline, and remain to tea."

Caroline Hall hesitated. "My uncle is so lonely. Still," be added, after a pause, "I can do him no good, and as to lying to raise his spirits, it's a hopeless task. Yes, I will say, Frances." She was glad to accept any excuse to get away from the home she had so little inclination for, uttorly regardless of the lonely hours of the poor old man. Frances, careless and pleused, lustened to help her off with her things. But on Leicester, more considerate, painfully repreached her her heart of hearts.

Mr. Castonel found his way that evening to the house of Soon after he came, Mrs. Chavasse, who is in her garden, saw the rector pass. She went to the te and leaned over it to shake hands with him,

"Have you heard the news?" she asked, being one who as ever ready to retail gossip. "Caroline Hall is going ) be married." "Indeed 1" he answered, in an accent of surprise. ave been much at Mr. Winnington's lately, and have leard nothing of it."

"She marries Mr. Castonel."

There was a pause. The clergyman scemed as though mable to comprehend the words. "Mrs. Chavasse, I hope you are under a mistake," he said at last. "I think you are.33

"No; it was all settled yesterday with old Winnington. Caroline told me so herself: she and Mr. Castonel are both here now."

"I um grieved to hear it! Mr. Castonel is not the mi

"That's just what I said. Will you walk in?"

"Not now. I will call for Ellen by and-by,"

"Not before nine," said Mrs. Climasse,

There were those in Elemy who had called Mr. Caston an attractive man, but I think it would have puzzled that to tell in what his attractions lay. He was by no mean good-looking; though perhaps not what could be called plain; one peculiarity of his, was, that he lated music and in society he was silent rather than otherwise. Ye he generally found favour with the ladies: they are prefi certain to like one who has the reputation of being general admirer. Had a stranger, that evening, been pri sent in the drawing-room of Mrs. Chaynese, he would no have suspected Mr. Castonel was on the point of marring with Miss Hall, for his gallant attentions to France Chavasse and Ellen Leicester, his evident admiration for both, were inconsistently apparent "especially considering the presence of Caroline. What she thought, it is in possible to say. She left early, and Mr. Castonel attended lier as far as her home.

Mr. Leicester had taken his way to the house of Mr Winnington. The surgeon was cowering over the fire, as Caroline had described. He shook hands with Mr. Leicester without rising, and pointed in silence to a chair. He looked yory ill; scarcely able to speak.

"I have heard some tidings about Caroline," began the retor.

Mr. Winnington groaned. "Oh, my friend, my friend," he said, "I have need of strong consolation under this affliction."

"You disapprove, no doubt, of Mr. Castonel?"

"Disapprove !" he repeated, roused to energy; "believe in I would rather Caroline went before me, than leave her the wife of Gervase Castonel."

Then why have you consented?"

I had no help for it," he sadly uttered. "They were before me, in this room, both of them, and they told me bey only cared for each other. Mr. Castonel informed at that if I refused my consent it was of little consequence, or he should take her without it. She is infatuated with im: and how and where they can have met so frequently, it appears they have done, is a wonder to me. Oh, he tof a mean, dishonourable spirit! And I have my doubts boot his liking her—liking her, even."

"Then why should be seek to marry her?" cried the ctor in surprise.

"I know not. I have been thinking about it all night all day, and can come to no conclusion. Save one," sadded, dropping his voice, "which is firm upon me, and all not leave me: the conviction that he will not treat her all. Would you," he asked, suddenly looking up, "would by give him Ellen?"

"No," most emphatically replied Mr. Leicester. "I clieve him to be a bad, immoral man. My calling takes as continually amongst the poor, and I can tell you Mr. astonel is much more warmly welcomed by the daughters han the parents. But nothing tangible has hitherto been rought against him. He is a deep man."

"His covert behaviour as to Caroline proves his depth. What about that strange person who followed him to Bury, and took the little lodge? You know what I neart.

"I can learn nothing of her," answered Mr. Leicester. She lives on, there, with that female attendant. I called mee, but she told me she must beg to decline my visits, as the wished to live in strict retirement. I suppose I should not have seen her at all, but the other person was out and she came to the door."

"I met her once," said Mr. Winnington. "She is ver handsome."

"Too landsome and too young to be living in mysterious a way," remarked the rector, significantly "She has evidently been reared as a gentlewoman; he accent and manner are perfectly helylike and refined. Did you mention her to Mr. Castonel?"

"I did. And he answered in an indifferent, hought, manner that the hely was a connexion of his own family who chose, for reasons of her own, good and upright, though they were kept secret, to pass her days just now in religiouent. He added that her character was unimpeachable, and no one, to him, should days impagn it. What could I answer?"

"Vory true. And it may be as he says: though the circumstances wear so suspicious an appearance."

"Oh that he had never come to Ebury!" exclaimed the surgeon, chasping his bands with emotion. "Not for the injury ho has done to me professionally; and I believe atrium to do, for there was room for me both: I have forgiven him this with all my heart, as it becomes a Christian, near the grave, to do. But my conviction tells me he is a bad man, a mysterious man—yea, my friend, I repeat it, a mysterious man—I feel him to be so, though it is an assertion I cannot explain; and I feel that he will assure Caroline's misery instead of happiness."

"Still, unless he is attached to her. I do not see why is should wed her," repeated the rector. "She has no fortune to tempt his canidity."

"Not do I see it," replied Mr. Winnington. "But it is so."

sit some cottages. On his return, he cut across the fields, rnear way, for he found it was getting dark, and close pon the time he intended to call for Ellen. As he passed the corner of Beech Wood, a retired spot just there, near to the pretty, but very small lodge originally built for gamekeeper, who should be suddenly encounter but its present inmate, the haly he and Mr. Winnington had been Her arm was within Mr. Castonel's, and she peaking of. ms talking rapidly, in tones, as it seemed, of remonstrance. The gentlemen bowed as they passed each other; both oldly pand had Mr. Leicester turned to sean the doctor's bee, he would have seen on it a sneer of malignant tiumph.

"I never saw a case more open to suspicion in my life," mattered the elergyman to himself. "And he just come from the presence of his future wife."

CHAPTER II.

MRS, MUFF'S DREAM,

"Come, Hannah, look alive," cried Mrs. Muff, some two months subsequent to the above details; "wash those decanters first: there's one short, but I'll see to that. Now you need not touch the knives: Jenu will clean them all in the morning. Do as I bid you, and then get out and dust the best china."

"There's the door bell," said Hannah.

"Go and answer it, and don't be an hour over it. I dam say it's the man with the potted meats. Tell him the rolls must be here in the morning by ten o'clock."

A most valuable person was Mrs. Muff in her vocation, and highly respected throughout Etony. An upright, portly, kindly-looking woman, of four or five and fifty, with an auburn "front," whose carls were always scraphlously smooth. She had for many years held the important situation of housekeeper at the Hall: but changes had occurred there, as they do in many places. On the death of Mr Winnington's sister, she had accepted the post of housekeeper o him, and had been there ever since. Hummah, a damse I twenty, being under her.

"Well, was it the baker?" she demanded, as Hannal acturned to the kitchen.

"No, ma'am. It was another wedding present for Mis Caroline, with Mrs. Major Acre's compliments. I took is up to her; she's in the drawing-room with Mr. Caronat"

"Ah!" grouned the housekeeper .- " book at the dust on hose glasses, Hannah. I thought you said you had wiped hem."

And what harm, ma'am, either?" returned Hannah, the very well understood the nature of the grean. "She'll m his wife to-morrow."

"Who said there was harm?" sharply retorted Mrs. "Only my poor master! -he is so lonely, and it sthe last evening she'll be here. Where are you running off to now? I told you to finish the decanters."

"Master called out for some coal as I passed the parlour," mswered Hannah. "The puzzle to me is, how he can bear a fire, this sultry August weather."

"Ah, child, you'll come to the end of many puzzles before you arrive at my years. Master's old and chilly, and breaking up as fast as he can break. I'll take the coal in myself."

Mr. Winnington did not look up, as the housekeeper put the coal on. But afterwards, when she was busy at the sideboard, he called out in sudden, quick tones--" Mrs. Muff."

«Sir I" she answered.

"What are you doing there?"

"I am changing the sherry wine, sir, into the ode decenter. We want this one to put ready with the others.

" For the show to-morrow?" he went on.

<sup>1</sup>6 To be sure, sir. For nothing else."

"Ay, Muff, put everything in order," he continue? "Don't let it be said that I opposed any of their wishe as old man such as I am, whom they will be glad to see c of the world. And you need not trouble yourself to I things up afterwards: they will be wanted again."

<sup>6</sup> For what purpose, sir? <sup>9</sup> she inquired.

" For the funeral,"

Mrs. Muff, as she said afterwards, was struck all of a hosp. And Mr. Winnington resumed:

"After a wedding comes a learning. She is beginning the cares of life, and I am giving them up for ever. And something tells me she will have her share of them, "I shall not be here to stand by her, Muff, so you must,"

The housekeeper trembled as she heard. He had a queen took on his face that she did not like.

- "I'll do what I can, sir," she said. "But when Miss Caroline has left here, that will be tan little,"
  - "You can go where she goes, Maff,"
  - " Perhaps not, sir."
- "Perhaps yes. Will you promise to do so, if you canif any possible way is opened? Promise me," he added eagerly and feverishly.
- "Well, sir," she answered, to humour him, "if it shalf be agreeable to all parties, yes, I will promise."
  - "And you will shield her from him, as far as you can ?"
- "Yes," repeated the housekeeper, most imperfectly understanding what Caroline was to be shielded from.
- "Now, Mrs. Muff," he concluded, in a solemn tone, "that's a death bargain. Remember it."
- "You don't seem well, sir," was Mrs. Muff's rejoinder.
  "Shall I call Miss Caroline to you?"
  - "No," he sadly answered. "Let her be,"

She was in the drawing-room with Mr. Castonel, as has been stated, laughing, talking, joking, unmindful of her fond uncle, who was dying in the room beneath. Her fress was a cool summer muslin, very pretty, with its open leeves, her dark hair was worn in bands, and her dark eyes were unimated. She began showing him some of the presents she had received that day, and slipped a bracelet on her arm to display it."

- "That is an elegant trinket," observed Mr. Castonel, "Who is it from?"
  - " Ellen Leicester,"

MOh," he hustily rejoined, "I heard it said to-day that he is not going to church with you that the parson's larch will not let her do so."

OIt is true," said Caroline. "I did not tell you of it, lervase, because I thought it might unnoy you, as it had lone me."

Annoy me! Oh dear, no. Let me hear what his ibjections were : what he said."

"I only gathered the substance of them from Mrs. Leicester. You know my uncle does not approve our mion, though he did give his consent. So on that score, Thelieve, Mr. Leicenter declined to allow Ellen to be one of my bridesmuids - he would not directly sanction what he was pleased to call an undutiful measure."

Castonel, with that peculiar sneer, cunning and malignant, m his face, which even Caroline disliked to see.

Of That he could not refuse. It is in his line of duty: Ellen is so vexed. We three had always promised each other that the two left would be bridesmaids to whichever was married first, I, Ellen, and Frances Chavasse."

Mr. Castonel laughed; a strange, ringing laugh, as F something amused him much; and Caroline looked at his in surprise.

The wedding-day dawned; not too promisingly. first place, the brilliant weather had suddenly changed, and the day rose pouring wet. In the second, Mr. Winnington, who, however, had never intended to go to church with them, was too ill to rise. Miss Chavasse was bridesmaid, and by half-past ten Gervase Castonel and Caroline Hall had been united for better for worse, until death did part them. Next came the breakfast, the Reverend Mr. Leicester, who had officiated, declining to go and partake of it, and then the bride and bridegroom started off in a carriage-and-four to spend a short honeymoon. Before they returned, Mr. Winnington was dead.

Again, reader, six months have clapsed, for time, as I told you, slipped on at Ebury as fast as it does at other places. No medical opponent had started, so Mr. Castons had the professional swing of the whole place, and wa getting on in it at railway speed. We are now in the col drizzly month of February, and it is a drizzling wretched day. In the bright kitchen, however, of Mr. Castonel, little signs are seen of the outside weather. The fire burns clear and the kettle sings, the square of carpet, never put dom until all cooking is over, extends itself before the hearth and good Mrs. Muff is presiding over all, her feet on a warm footstool, and her spectacles on mose, for she ha drawn the stand before her on which rests her Bible. Prosoutly a visitor came in, a figure clothed in travelling attire limp and moist, introduced by the tiger John, who had encountered it at the door as he was going out on a errand for his master.

"My goodness me, Hannah! it's never you?"

"Xos, ma'am, it is," was Hannah's reply, with a low abulsance to Mrs. Muff.

"And why did you not come yesterday as wastagreed upon?"

"It rained so hard with us, mother said I had bette wait; but as to-day turned out little better, I came through it, Sho'd have paid for an inside place, but the coach was full, so I came outside."

"Well, get off your wet things, and we'll have a cup of tou," said Mrs. Muff, rising and setting the tea-things.

"Mother sends her duty to you, ma'am," said Hannah, as she sat down to the tea table, after obeying directions, and bade me say she was obliged to you for kindly thinking of me, and getting me a place under you again,"

"Ah! we little thought, some months back, that we should ever be serving Mr. Castonel."

"Nothing was ever further from my thoughts, ma'am."

"I wished to come and live with Miss Caroline; I had a own reasons for it," resumed Mrs. Muff; "and, as lack ad it, she had a breeze with the maids here, after she came ome, and gave them both warning. I fancy they had lone as they liked too long, under Mr. Castonel, to put up at the control of a mistress, and Miss Caroline, if put ut, can be pretty sharp and hasty. However, they were aving, and I heard of it, and came after the place. Miss baroline—dear! I mean Mrs. Castonel—thought I ought a lock out for a superior one to hers, but she said she should be too glad to take me if I did not think so. So we I came, and here I have been; and when, a week ago, he girl under me mishehaved herself, I thought of you and poke to mistress, so we sent for you. Now you know how that all happened, Hannah."

"Yes, ma'am, and thank you. Is Miss Caroline sell?"

"Mrs. Castonel," interrupted the housekeeper. "Did on not hear me correct myself? She is getting better."

"Has she been ill?" returned Hannah.

"III! I believe you. It was a near touch, Hannah whether she lived or died."

"What has been the matter, Mrs. Muff?"

"Never you mind what," said the old lady, somewhat sharply. "She has been ill, but is getting better, and that's enough for you. I'll step up, and ask if she wants snything."

Hannah cast her eyes round the kitchen; it looked a very comfortable one, and she thought she should be happy enough in her new abode. Everything was bright and dean to a fault, betokening two plain facts, the presiding genius of Mrs. Muff, and plenty of work for Haunah, who knew she should have to keep things as she found them,

"Mrs. Castonel will have some ten presently, not just yet, said Mrs. Muff, returning. "How ill she does look. He face has no more colour in it than a corpse. It put mon mind of my dream."

"Have you had a bad dream lately, ma'am?" inquire Hannah. For there was not a more inveterate dreamer, of interpretor of dreams, than Mrs. Muff, and nothing lot was sho to find a listener for them.

"Indeed I have," she answered, "and a dream that don't like. It was just three nights ago. I had gone to bed, dead asleep, having been up part of several had nights with my mistress, and I undressed in no time, and was asleep as quick. All on a sudden, for I remembers no event that seemed to lead to it, I thought I saw my of master-----

"The squire?" interrupted Hammh.

"Not the squire: what put him in your head? Mr Winnington. I thought I saw him standing at the foo of the bed, and after looking at me fixedly, as if to drar my attention, he turned his head showly towards the door I heard the stairs creaking, as if somebody was coming u step by stop, and we both kept our eyes on the door, waiting in expectation. It began to move on its hinges, ver slowly, and I was struck with horror, for who should appear at it but——"

Previously wrought up to shricking pitch, received their climax, for at that very moment a loud noise was hear outside the kitchen door, which was only pushed to, no closed.

"What a simpleton you be I" wrathfully exclaimed Mrs Muff, who, however, had edged lier own chair into closs mtact with Hannah's. "I dure say it is only master in is laboratory."

After the lapse of a few reassuring seconds, Mrs. Muff oved towards the door, looked out, and then went towards small room adjoining it.

"It is as I thought," she said, coming back and closing edoor, "it is muster in his laboratory. But now that's hold thing," she added, musingly.

What is odd, ma'nm?"

"Why, how muster could have come down and gone in lere without my hearing him. I left him sitting with listress. Perhaps she has dozed off; she does sometimes at usk; and he crept down softly for fear of disturbing her." "But what was the noise?" asked Hannah, breathlessly. "Taw, child! d'ye fear it was a ghost? It was only Mr. astonel let fall one of the little drawers, and it went down ith a clatter. And that's another odd thing, now I come think of it, for I ulways believed that top drawer to be dummy drawer. It has no lock and no knob, like the thers."

"What is a dummy drawer?" repeated Hannah.

"A false drawer, child, one that won't open. John hinks so too, for last Saturday, when he was cleaning the aboratory, I went in for some string to tie up the beef lives I was making for dinner. He was on the steps, tretching up his duster to that very drawer, and he called at, 'This here drawer is just like your head, Madam Muff.'"

10 How so?' asked I.

e, in his impudent way, and rushed off the steps into the grden, fearing I should box his ears. But it is this very haver master has now let fall, and there were two or three little papers and phials, I saw, scattered on the floor. I up, but he looked at me as black as thunder, and roam out, 'No. Go away and mind your own business.' Didy you hear him?"

"I heard a man's voice," replied Hannah; "I did n know it was Mr. Castonel's. But about the dream, ma'an you did not finish it."

"True, and it's worth finishing," answered the hous keeper, settling herself in her chair. Where was 12 Oh -I thought at the foot of the bed stood Mr. Winnington and when the footsteps came close, and the door openedso slowly, Hannah, and we watching in suspense all ti time-who should it he but Mr. and Mrs. Castonel. Sh was in her grave-clothes, a flaunel dress and cap, edge with white quilled ribbon, and she looked for all the worl as she looks this night. He had got hold of her hand, at he handed her in, remaining himself at the door, and m old master bent forward and took her by the other hand Mr. Winnington looked at me, as much as to say, Do yo see this? and then they both turned and gazed after Mi Castonel. I heard his footsteps descending the stairs, and upon looking again at the foot of the bed, they were both I woke up in a dreadful fright, and could not go to sleep again for two hours,"

"It's a mercy it wasn't me that dreamt it," observed Hannah. "I should have rose the house, screeching."

"It was a nasty dream," added Mrs. Muff, "and it mistress had not been out of all danger, and getting better as fast as she can get, I should say it betokened —something not over-pleasant."

She was interrupted by Mrs. Castonella bell. It was for a oup of ten, and Mrs. Muff took it up. As she passed the laboratory, she saw that Mr. Castonel was in it still. Mrs. Castonel was seated in an arm-chair by her bedroom fire.

"Then you have not been asteen, ma'am ?" absenced

Hannah stood waiting, not knowing whether to take temp or not.

"Is Mr. Castonel in his study ?"

"If you please, ma'ora, which place is that??

"The front room on the left-hand side, opening oppose to the dining-room," said Mrs. Costonel.

"I don't think it is there then," replied Hannali. "I is in the little room where the bottles are, next the kitcht I forget, ma'am, what Mrs. Muff called it."

. "Oh, is he? Open the door, Hannah,".

The girl obeyed, and Mrs. Castonel called to shi

He heard her, and came immediately to the foot of f stairs. "What is it?" he asked.

" May I have unother cup of ten ?"

He ran upstairs and entered the room. "Have ye taken your ten already?" he said, in accents of surpri and displeasure. "I told you to wait until seven o'clock! "I was so thirsty. To say I may have another or Gervase. I am sure it will not hart me."

"Bring up half a cup," he said to the servant, "and son more bread-and-butter. If you drink, Caroline, you mue cat."

Hannah went downstairs. She procured what we wanted and was carrying it from the kitchen again, who Mr. Castonel came out of the laboratory, to which appeared he had returned.

"(live it me," he said to Hannah. "I will take it mysel to your mistress."

So he proceeded upstairs with the little waiter, and Hannah returned to the kitchen. "How much she altered t" was her exchanation, as she closed the door.

"What did she say to you?" questioned Mrs. Muff. "Well, ma'am, she chiefly raid master knowledge.

we your legs," returned Hannah. "I never knew Miss droline so thoughtful before. I thought it was not in ler."

And that has surprised me, that she should evince so and lately," assented Mrs. Muff. "Thoughtfulness does to the young suddenly. It's a thing that only ames with years - or sorrow."

"Sorrow!" echoed Hannah. "Miss Caroline can't have iny sorrow."

"Not not that I know of," somewhat dubiously remonded the housekeeper.

"Is Mr. Castonel fond of her? Does he make her a mod husband?" asked Hannah, full of woman's curlosity m such points.

"What should hinder him?" testily retorted Mrs. Muff.

"Has that that strange lady left the place?" was lamah's next question. "She that, people said, had omothing to do with Mr. Castonel." A Second William Co.

"What to do with him?" was the sharp demand.

"Was his consin, ma'am, or sister-in-law, or some relatic I that sort," explained Hannah, with a face demure enoug. edisarm the anger of the fastidious Mrs. Muff.

"I believe she has not left," was the stiff response : "I mow nothing about her."

"Do you suppose Miss Caroline does?" added Hannali.

"Of course she does, all particulars," returned Mrs. duff, with a peculiar suiff, which she invariably gave when owing her lips to an untruth. "But it's not your business, e you may just put it out of your head, and never say any aore about it. And you may begin and wash up the teahings. John don't deserve any tea for not coming in; and have a great mind to make him go without. He is always topping in the street to play." Flant Chin. Deligner and iraniah mas status to ohov when the bedroom bell rang most violently, and Mr. Castonel was heard bursting out the room, and calling loudly for assistance.

"Whatever can be the matter?" was the terrified of clamation of Mrs. Muff. "Mistress has never droppe asleep, and fallen off her chair into the fire! Follow's upstairs, girl. And that lazy tiger a phying truent !"

Not for many a year had the housekeeper flown upstai so quickly. Humah followed more slowly, from a vaga consciousness of dread of what she might see; the drea she had shuddered at, being before her mind in vivi Mrs. Castonel was in convulsions. colonna.

About the same hour, or a little later, Mr. Leiceste returned to his home, having been absent since morning "Well," he cheerily said, as he took his seat by the fix "have you may news? A whole day from the parish seem a long absence to me."

"I think not," answered Mrs. Leicester, "Except tha I went to see Caroline Castonel to-day, and she is getting on well,"

"I am glad to hear it. Is she quite out of danger?"

Completely so,"

"She told meaning that she should be at church on Sunday," added Ellen.

"Yes, but I told her that would be imprudent," returned Mrs. Leicester. "However, she will soon be well HOW,11

At that moment the church bell rang out with its three times two, denoting the recent departure of a soul. The church, situated at the end of the village street, was immediately opposite the parsonage, the main road dividing them. The sound struck upon their ears loud and full; very solomnly in the stillness of the winter's night.

Constornation fell upon all. No one was ill in the village-at least, ill enough for death Charles and a by knew, by the strokes, it was not a male-have beenalled away suddenly?

"The passing-bell I" uttored the rector, rising from hisat in agitation. " And I to have been absent ! Have I gen summoned out ?" he hurriedly asked of Mrs. Leicester. "No; I assure you, no. Not any one has been for you. Wither have we heard of any illness."

Mr. Luicester touched the hell-rope at his clow. A. asid-servant answered it. Benjamin was attending to his "Step over," said the rector, "and inquire who is dead."

She departed. A couple of minutes at the most would se her back again. They had all risen from their seats, and stood in an expecting, almost a reverent attitude. The hell was striking out quickly now. The girl returned, looking terrified.

"It is the passing-bell, sir, for Mrs. Castonel I"

The mornage was cold and misty, and the Reverend Christopher Leicester felt a strange chill and depression of pirits, for which he could not account, when he stepped into the chariot that was to convey him to Mr. Castonel's.

Mrs. Chavasse and Frances came into the parsonage. Ostensibly for the purpose of inviting Ellen to spend the following day with them: in reality to see the funeral. They had not long to wait.

The undertaker came first in hatband and scarf, and then the black chariot containing the Reverend Mr. Leicester, Before the hearse walked six carriers, and the mourningcoach came last. It was a plain, quiet funeral.

It drew up at the churchyard-gate, in full view of the parsonage windows, all of which had their blinds closely drawn. But they managed to peep behind the blinds.

The rector stepped out first, and stood waiting at the church door in his officiating dress, his book open in his hands. There was some little delay in getting the burden from the hearse, but at length the carriers had it on their shoulders, and here it up the path with measured, even steps, themselves nearly hidden by the pall. Mr. Castonel followed, his handkerchief to his face. He betrayed at that moment no outward sign of emotion, but his face could not have been exceeded in whiteness by that of his dead wife.

"Oh!" said Ellen, shivering, and turning from the light, as she burst into tears, "what a dreadful sequel it is to the day when he last got out of a carriage at the churchysed gate, and she was with him, in her gay happiness! Poor Mr. Castonel, how he must need consolation!"

"It is nothing of a funeral, after all," said Mrs. Clavased discontentedly; "no pall-hearers, no mates, no anything. I wonder he did not have a little more fires and veremony!"

CHAPTER III.

ELLEN LEIGESTER.

The hot day had nearly passed, and the sun, approaching its setting, threw the lengthening shade of the trees across the garden of Mrs. Chavasse. The large window of a pleasant room opened on to it; and in this room stood a fair, graceful girl, with one of the loveliest faces ever seen in Ebury. Her dark blue eyes were bent on the ground: is well they might be; the rose of her check had deepened to crimson: as well it might do; for a gentleman's arm had foully encircled her waist, and his lips had pushed aside the cluster of soft hair, and were rendering that damask still deeper. Alus that her whole uttitude, as she stood there, should tell of such rapturous happiness!

Neither was an inhabitant of that house; both had come in to pay an evening visit, and the young lady had thrown off her bounet and mantle. It may be that those visits were accidental; but, if so, they took place nearly every evening. It happened that Mrs. and Miss Chavasse on this occasion were out, but were expected to enter every minute; so, being alone, they were improving the time.

And this from Miss Leicester, the carefully brought-up daughter of the Rector of Ebury! That she should repose quietly in the embrace of that man without attempting to withdraw from it! Yes; and love has caused many to do as much. But oh, that the deep, ardent affection, of which Ellen Leicester was so eminently capable, had been directed into any other channel than the one it had irrevocably entered upon!

For he who stood beside her was Gervase Castonel. It was not that he had once been married, but it was that there were some who deemed him a bad mun, a mysterious man with his sinister expression of face, when he did not care to cheek it, and his covert ways. Why should he have cast his coils round Ellen Loicester 7 why have striven to gain hor. love, when there were so many others whose welcome to him would have carried with it no ultoy? It would almost seem that Mr. Castonel went by the rules of contrary, as the children say in their play. The only persons into whose houses he had not been received, and who had both taken so strange and unconquerable a dislike to him, were the late Mr. Winnington and the Reverend Christopher Leicester. Yet he had chosen his first wife in the niece of the first, and it seemed likely (to us who are in the secret) that he was seeking a second in the daughter of the latter. that he should have been able to do his work so effectually; that Ellen Leicester, so good and dutiful, should have been won over to a passion for him little short of infatuation, and that it should have been kept so secret from the whole world! Never was there a man who could go more mysteriously to work than Gervase Castonel.

"You speak of a second marriage, Ellen, my love," he was saying, "but how often have I told you that this carcely applies to me. Were it that I had lived with her rears of happiness, or that I had loved her, then your objections might have reason. I repeat to you, however much you may despise me for it, that I married her, earing only for you. Before I was awake to my own sensations, I had gone too far to retract; I had asked for her of old Winnington, and in honour I was obliged to keep to my hasty agagement. Even in our early marriage days, I knew that loved but you; sleeping or waking, it was you who were meent to me. Oh, Ellen! you may disbelieve and refuse love me, but in mercy say it not."

There was honey in the words of Mr. Castonel, there was greater honey in his tones, and Ellen Leicester's heart beat more rapidly within her. She disbelieve aught asserted by

"Ellen, you judge wrongly," was his reply, as she whispered something in his ear. "It is a duty sometimes to leave father and mother."

"But not disobediently, not wilfully. And I know that they would never consent. You know it also, Gervase."

"My durling Ellon, this is nonsense. Suppose I were to eld to your soruples, and marry another in my anger? hat then. Ellen?"

"I think it would kill mo!" she narmured.

"And because Mr. and Mrs. Leicester have taken an njust projudice ugainst me, both our lives are to be rendered userable ! Would that be justice? Suppose you were m ife; do suppose it, only for a moment, Ellen; suppose hat we were irrevocably united, we should then not ha onsent to ask, but forgiveness."

She looked carnestly at him, and as his true meaning ame across her, the mild expression of her deep blue eyes gave place to terror.

"Oh, Gervase," she implored, clasping his arm in agitation, " nover say that again ! As you value my peace here and hereafter, do not tempt me to disobedience. I mistook your menning, did I not?" she continued, in rapid tones of "Gervase, I say, did I not mistake you?"

He felt that he had been too hasty: the right time had not come. But it would come: for never did Corvase Miss Chavasse entered. Ellen Leicester was in the garde then; she had glided out on hearing her approach. All Mr. Castonel was scated back in an armeliair, intent upo a newspaper.

"Oh," excluimed Frances, "I am sorry we should hav been out. I am sure we are obliged to you for waiting to us, Mr. Castonel."

"I have not waited long; but if I had waited the wholevening I should be amply repaid now." He spoke soft and impressively, as he detained her hand in his; and from his manner, then, it might well have been thought that hintended Frances Chavasse for his wife; at least, it neve could have been believed that he was so urdently pursuing another.

"And Ellen Leicester is here!" added Frances; "for that's her bonnet. Have you seen her?"

"Who? Miss Leicester? Yes, I believe I did see her But I was so engaged with this paper. Here is some interesting medical evidence in it."

"Is there?" But at that moment. Ellen Leicester came to the window. "How long have you been here?" asked Frances.

"About an hour," was Miss Leicester's answer.

"What an awful girl for truth that is !" was the angry mental comment of Mr. Castonel.

"I must say you have proved yourselves sociable companions," remarked Frances, "You mope in the garden, Ellen, and Mr. Castonel bores over an old newspaper! Let is have a song,"

Now Mr. Custonel lated singing, but Frances sat down to the piano, and he was pleased to stand behind her and clasp the hand of Ellen Leicester. Yet Frances, had she been asked, would have said Mr. Custonel's attention was given to herself; ny, and glorfed in saving it. for she libed he man, and would have had no objection to becoming his scond wife. It may be that she was scheming for it. Thus they remained until the night came on, and the moon as up. Frances, never tired of displaying her rich voice, and Ellen Leicester content to stand by his side, had the tanding lasted for ever. Moonlight music and meetings so dangerous things.

A servant came for Ellen Leicester, and Mr. Castonel salked home with her. They went not the front way, but drough the lane, which brought them to the back-door of the rectory. Was it that Ellen shrank from going openly, lest her parents might see from the windows that Mr. Castonel was her companion? He lingered with her for a few moments at the gate, and when she entered she found her mother alone; the rector was out. To her it had been a delicious walk, and she felt that life would be indeed a blank, if not shured with Gervase Castonel.

Ellen had been invited to spend the next evening witl Miss Chavasse, as was a frequent occurrence, and it we chiefly in these evening meetings that her love had grow ap and ripened. Mr. Castonel was over a welcome visite to Mrs. Chavasse, and Frances had laughed, and talked, and firted with him, until a warmer feeling had arisen in her heart. He had all the practice of Ebury, being its only resident medical man, so in a pecuniary point of view he was a desirable match for Frances. Little deemed they that Ellen Leicester was his attraction. A tacit sort of rivalry with Ellen existed in the mind of Frances: she thought of her as a rival in beauty, a rival in position, a rival in the favour of Ebury. But she was really fond of Ellen, always anxious to have her by her side, and it never once ontered into her brain that Mr. Castonel, who was under cold displeasure at the rectory, should seek the favour of Ellen. Again went Ellen that evening to the house of Mrs.

Chavasse, and again went Mr. Castonel. They, the three passed it in the garden, a large rambling place, nearly as full of weeds as of flowers. They rounted about the different walks, they sat on the benches; Mr. Castonel's attention being given chiefly to Frances, not to Ellen, his custom when with both. Frances possessed her mother's old talent for flirtation, and Mr. Castonel was nothing loth to exercise And so the evening passed, and the summer moon rose in its course.

"Oh I" suddenly oried Frances, as they were returning to the house, "I have forgotten the bay-leaves manua told me to gather. Now I must go back all down to the end of the garden."

She probably thought Mr. Castonel would follow her-He did not do so. He furned to Ellen Leicester, and drawing her amongst the sheltering trees, clusped her to him.

"I shall wish you good night now, my darling," he murmured, "this moment is too precious to be lost. Oh, Milen I are things to go on like this for ever? It is true these evening nicetings are a consolation to us, for they are spont in the presence of each other, but the hours which ought to be yours, and yours only, are thrown away in idle nonsense with Frances Chavasse. Oh, that we had indeed a right to be together and alone! When is that time to some?-for come it must, Ellen. When two people love as ve do, and no justiliable impediment exists to its being logally ratified, that ratification will take place sooner or Think of this," he murmured, reluctantly releasing her as the steps of Miss Chavasse were heard drawing near.

"I expected you were in the house by this time," she exclaimed breathlessly, "and you are only where I left you."

"We waited for you," said Mr. Castonel.

"Very considerate of you!" was the reply of Frances.

She had expected Mr. Castonel ken in a tone of pique. blow her.

they walked on towards the house, Mr. Castonel giving arm to Frances. Talking was hourd in the drawinget, and they recognized the voice of Mr. Leicester.

I will go round here," said Mr. Castonel, indicating a h which led to a side gate. "If I enter, they will keep talking; and I have a patient to see."

He extended a hand to each, as he spoke, by way of swell, but Frances turned along the path with him. en sat down on a gardon-chair and waited. The voices m the house came distinctly to her ear in the quiet night. "They will be in directly," Mrs. Chavasse was saying. Mr. Castonel is with them. He and Frances grow greater iends than ever."

"Beware of that friendship," interrupted Mr. Leicester. It may lend to something more."

"What if it should?" asked Mrs. Chavasse.

The rector paused, as if in surprise. "Do I understand m rightly, Mrs. Chavasse—that you would suffer Frances obecome his wife?"

"Who is going to marry Frances?" inquired Mr. Chavasse, stering, and hearing the last words.

"Nobody," answered his wife. "We were speculating on Mr. Castonel's attention to her becoming more pointed. I'm sure any one might be proud to have him : he must be mking a large income."

"My objection to Mr. Castonel is to his character," eturned the clergymun. "He is a bad man, living an irregular life. The world may call it gallantry: I call it

"You ullude to that mysterious girl who followed him down here," said Mrs. Chavasse. "You know what he told Mr. Winnington-that it was a relation, a lady of family and character. Of course it is singular, her living on her in the way she does, but it may be quite right, for all that "I saw him stealing off there last night, as I came home observed the rector. "But I do not allude only to the There are other things I could tell you of : some the harmened during the lifetime of his wife."

'Then I tell you what," interrupted Mr. Chavasse, in hi bluff, hearty manner, "a man of that sort should never hay a daughter of mine. So mind what you and Frances ar about, Mrs. Chavasse,"

"That's just like papa," whispered Frances, who has returned to Ellen Leicester. "Spenking forcely one minute eating his words the next. Mamma always turns him roun her little tinger."

"As you value your daughter's happiness, keep her from Mr. Castonel," resumed the elergyman, "I doubt him if more ways than one,"

"Do listen to your papa, Ellen," again whispered France.

" How prejudiced he is against Mr. Castonel."

"My dear father is prejudiced against him," was Ellen't "He says he met him stealing off to her house thought. last night-if he only knew that he was stealing back from taking me home 1 "

Ellen was mistaken. It was later in the evening that the rector had met Mr. Castonel.

"Must I give him up 1" she went on, in mental anguish; " It will cost me the greatest of all earthly misery : perhaps even my life. But I cannot have the curse of disobedience on my soul. I must, I will give him up,"

Ah, Ellen Leicester! you little know how such good resolutions fail when one is present with you to combat them ! However, cherish your intention for the present, if you will. It will come to the same in the end.

"Ellen," Pronces continued to whisper, "what is it that?

padices your papa against Mr. Castonel? Caroline toldherself, after her marriage, that that person was a relagef his, one almost like a sister. You heard her say so." Ellen Leicester did not answer, and Frances turned ands her. It may have been the effect of the moonlight, ther face looked cold and white as the snow in winter.

It was a fine evening in October. Mr. Castonel had ged, and the tiger lighted the lamp and placed it, with port wine, on the tuble before him. Mr. Castonel was mentarly foud of a glass of good port; but he let it main untouched on this day, for he was buried in thought. It was a slight-made man, neither handsome nor plain, and runfathoumble grey eyes never looked you in the face. It may the bell, and the tiger answered it.

Send Mrs. Muff to me. And, John, don't leave the msc. I shall want you."

The housekeeper came in, closed the door, and came wards him. He was then pouring out his first glass of

"Muff," he began, "there's a small, black portmanteau mowhere about the house. A hand-portmanteau."

"Yes, sir. It is in the closet by John's room."

"Het it out, and put a week's change of linen into it.
Mithe tailor send home some new clothes to-day?"

"He did, sir, and I ordered Hannah to take them up-

"They must be put in. And my shaving-tackle, and such things. I am going out for a few days."

Mrs. Muff was thunderstruck. She had never known Mr. Castonel to leave Ebury since he had settled in it, excepting on the occasion of his marriage.

You have given me a surprise, sir," she said, "but I'll to to the things. Do you want them for to-morrow?"

" For this evening."

Mrs. Muff thought her cars must have deceived h The last coach for the distant railway station had k Besides, she had heard Mr. Castonel make an appointme in Ebury for the following day at twelve. sir!" she repeated. "The conches have all gone, T last drove by as John was bringing out the dinner-tray."

"For this evening," repeated Mr. Castonel, with further comment, "In half an hour's time, And, My you must get the house cleaned and put thoroughly order whilst I am away. Let the dressing-room adjoint my bed-chamber be made ready for use, the scent-bottl and trumpery put on the dressing-table, as it was in-in t Lime of Mrs. Castonel."

This was the climax. Mrs. Muff's speech failed her.

5 This is Tuesday. I intend to be home on Monday nox I shall probably bring a a person a companion hon with me. 5

"A what, sir ?" demanded Mrs. Muff.

"A friend will accompany me, 1 say,"

"Very well, sir. Which room shall I get ready?"

"Room ! What for ? "

Mrs. Maff was growing bewildered. "I thought yo said a gentleman was returning with you, sir. I asked which bed-chamber I should prepare for him."

"My own,"

"Certainly, sir," answered the housekeeper, hesitatingly "And in that case, which room shall I prepare for you?"

Mr. Castonel laughed; such a strange hangle, "I will tell you then," he replied. "You must also send for the gardoner, and get the garden done up. Send to-morrow morning, and let him begin. John can help him : he will not have much to do whilst I am away."

groupt mischief," added the housekeeper. "I'll keep ato it, sir."

And, Muff, if any one comes after me to-night, no Mr who, or how late, say I have gone to an argent case the country, and send them to Mr. Rice. You resher, now, no matter who. You may tell the whole town morrow, and the dence besides, for all it can signify then." Tell what, sir ? "

That I have gone out for a week's holiday."

Mrs. Mull withdrew, interly stapedied. She thought that ers beside herself, or that Mr. Castonel was,

That summe evening, not very long after the above intera Ellen Leicester, attended by a maid, left her home, tshe had promised to take ten with Mrs. Chavasse. In sing a lonely part of the road, where the way branched to the railroad, they came upon Mr. Castonel. ook hands with Miss Loucester, and gave her his arm, my that he was also bound for Mrs. Chavasse's. "I will le charge of you now," he added; "you need not trouble armuid to come any further."

"Very true," morninged Ellen ...." Martha," she said, ming to the servant, " if you would like two or three sees to yourself to-night, you may have them. Perhaps a would like to go home and see your mother,"

The girl thanked her, and departed cheerfully towards a village. Could she have peered beyond a turning in to way, she might have seen a post-carriage drawn up, idently waiting for travellors, The rector and his wife sat The time went on to nine. wer the fire, the former shivering, for he had caught a wheat cold. "I suppose you have some nitre in the louse?" he suddenly observed.

" But Really I fear not," answered Mrs. Leicester. lean sand for some. Will you touch the bell?"

- "Is Benjamin in?" demanded Mrs. Leicester of the
- "No, ma'am. Master said he was to go and see ho Thomas Shipley was, and he is gone,"
- "Then tell Martha to put her bonnet on. She mis fetch some nitre."
- "Martha is not come in, ma'am, since she went out; take Miss Leicester."
- "No!" uttered Mrs. Leicester, in surprise. "Whit was at six o'clock. I wonder what is detaining her?

Benjamin came in, and was sent for the nitre, and soo Martha's voice was heard in the kitchen. Mrs. beiesst ordered her in.

- "Martha, what do you mean by staying out without leave?"
- "Betsy has been on at me about it in the kitchen," we the girl's roply. "But it is Miss Ellen's fault, make she told me I might have a few hours for myself."
- "When did she tell you that?" demanded Mrs. Leicest doubting if Ellen had said it.
- "When we came to Piebald-corner, ma'ann. Mr. Castone was standing there, and he said he would see Miss Ellensaf to Mrs. Chavasse's, and it was then she told me."

The rector looked up, anger on his face,

- "Did you leave her with Mr. Castonel?"
- "Yes, sir, 1 did,"
- "Then understand, Martha, for the future. If you gout to attend Miss Leicester, you are to attend her. You have done wrong. It is not seemly for Miss Leicester to habroad in the evening without one of her own attendants,"
- "Now this has finished it," he continued, to his wife, a the girl withdrew. "Ellen shall not go there again unles you are with her. Mr. Castonel! How dared he? would rather Ellen made a companion of the poorest an ast person in the village. And should there be any agement growing up between him and Frances, I will have Ellen there to countenance it with her presence." Poor Mr. Winnington prejudiced you against Mr. stonel," observed Mrs. Leicester. "I do not admire or whim, but I think less ill of him than you do. Perhaps 'mices might do worse."

The dergyman turned his head and looked at her. "I illusk you a home question, Susan. Would you care to whim marry Ellen ? "

"Oh no, no!" and Mrs. Leicester almost shuddered as hespoke. "Not for worlds!"

"Yet you would see him the husband of Frances Chavasse ; your early friend's child !"

Mrs. Leicester hesitated before she spoke. "It is that I so to see Ellen the wife of a religious man, a good man, II fear Mrs. Chavasse does not consider that for Frances. e thinks of social fitness, of position, of Mr. Castonel's ing in favour with the world. But Ellen-no, no, I ast never to see her the wife of such a man as Mr. stonel."

The minister covered his face with his hands. "I wor' ther read the burial service over her."

When Benjamin returned, he was despatched for M eleester, and told to husten. But he came back and s. liss Loicester was not there.

"Not there I" exclaimed the rector, "Why, where have pu been for her? I told you to go to Mrs. Chavasse's."

"That's where I have been, sir."

"Then you have made some stupid blunder. She must be there."

"I don't think I made any blunder, sir," returned Benjamin, who was a simple-speaking man of forty. "When I told 'em I had come for Miss Ellen, one of their maids joked and said then I had come to the wrong house, she took in the message, and Mrs. Chavassa came out me. She said as they had expected Miss Ellen to tea, waited for her, but she did not come."

Nothing could exceed the indignation of the red Where was Ellen? Where could she be gono? Was possible that Mr. Custonel had persuaded her to go visit anywhere else? In spite of his wife's remonstrances, was used him he was too ill to venture forth, and wo eatch his death, he turned out in search of her; and M Leicester, worried and angry, haid all the blame up Martha, who immediately began to cry her eyes out.

Before noon the next day, Elmry was ringing with t clopement of Mr. Castonel and Ellen Leicester.

It had been well could be as easily have forg her. In these few months he had become a bowed, broken His hair had changed from brown to grey, and i rumoured that he had never since enjoyed a whole r rest. Could this fail to tell on Ellen? who, excepting one strange and unaccountable act, had always h gentle, loving, obedient daughter. She watched it al knew that it had been her work. Moreover, there arising, within her, doubts of Mr. Castonel wheth was the idol she had taken him to be. She was a bad health, and suffered much. She booked worn, hag wrotched; curious comments on which went about E and the people all agreed that Mrs. Castonel did not to repose on a bed of roses,

"There's a row upstairs," exclaimed the tiger to Ha one day in April. "Missis is sobbing and crying bu full, and master has been a blowing of her up."

"How do you know? Where are they?" said Han "In the drawing-room. I went up to ask what med was to go out, but they were too busy to see me. Ih master a couring as I went up the stairs, like he coare me one day, and nearly frightened my skin off me. It something about missis going so much to the parson she said it was her duty, and he said it wasn't. lying on the sofn, a sobbing and meaning awful."

"I think you must have peeped in," cried Ham

" For shame of you t"

"In course I did. Wouldn't you? Oh dear no, I c my not 1. Master was kneeling down then, a kissing of 1 and asking her to forget what he'd said in his passion, to get herself culm, for that it would do her unknown ha And he vowed, if she'd only stop crying, that he'd take hisself to the parsonage this evening, and stop the wh of it with her ____ " that is that you are saying?" sharply demanded Mrs. putting her head into the kitchen.

was a telling Hannah she'd best sew that there butten y best livery trousers, what came off 'em last Sunday, or get her neck wrung," answered the lad, vaulting away, ether the tiger's information was correct, and that ment was likely to have an injurious effect upon Mrs. arel, certain it is, that the following day she was I with illness. The nature of it was such as to destroy hope that had sprung up in her heart, and precisely ar to that which had preceded the death of the first Castonel.

What an extraordinary thing I" eried Mrs. Chavasse, the news reached her; "it looks like fatality. Caroline been six months married when she fell ill; and now, in manner, Ellen falls ill I - I hope she will not follow her out to the last, and die of it."

For the matter of that, we never knew what the first Castonel did die of," returned Mrs. Major Aère, who sitting there. "She was recovering from her sickness; ed, it may be said that she had recovered from it; and went off suddenly one evening, nobody knew with what." Mr. Castonel said it was perfectly satisfactory to medical "she had Mrs. Chavasse." There are so many dangerous ks and turns of maladies, you know, only clear to maly each of maladies.

for several days Elien Castonel was very ill. Not, perhaps, absolute danger, but sufficiently near it to excite appresion. Then she began to get better. During this time hing could exceed the affection and kindness of Mr. stonel; his attention was a marvel of admiration, allowed be so, even by Mrs. Leicester.

One afternoon, when he was dressed and in the drawingm. Mrs. and Miss Chayasse called. They were the first

Mrs. Leicester made ten; and for once Ellen was happy. There appeared to be more sociable feeling between he husband and father than she had over hoped for, and a joyou vision flitted across her of time bringing about a thoroug reconciliation, and of their all being happy together. She laughed, she talked, she almost sung; and Mr. and Mr. Leicester inquired what had become of the depression spoke of in Mr. Castonel's note. He answered pleasantly that their presence had scared it away, and that if they did no mind the trouble of coming out, it might be well to try the experiment again on the following evening; he could see it was the best medicine for his degrees. Ellen. They promise to do so, even Mr. Leicester. Especially, he added, as he must leave almost directly.

The glow on Ellen's face faded. "Why leave, papa?"

"My dear, there is a vestry meeting to night, and I mus attend it. Your mamma can remain."

"Will you not return when it is over?" resumed Ellen anxiously.

"No. It will not be over until late. It is likely to be a stormy one."

<sup>6</sup> But you will come to morrow? And remain longer? she feverishly added.

"Child, I have said so."

"Upon one condition—that she does not excite herself over it," interposed Mr. Castonel, affectionately laying his hand upon his wife's. "Add that proviso, sir,"

"Oh, if Eden is to excite herself, of course that would stop it," returned the rector, with a smile. The first smile his countenance had worn since her disobalience.

Ellen saw it, and her heart rose up in thankfulness within her. "Dearest papa," she whispered, leaning towards him, "I will be quite calm. It will be right in time between us all: I see it will. I am so happy!" g together the members of the select vestry, and Mr. ster took his departure. His wife remained with Ellen, Castonel also; nothing called him out; and they spent ppy, cordial evening together. When she rose to leave, Castonel rang the bell for Mrs. Muff to attend her. He is not leave Ellen.

What nonsense 1" said Mrs. Leicester, "As if any one blrun away with me ! I shall be at home in five minutes, and not trouble Mrs. Muff."

It will do Muff good," said Ellen. "She has never red out since my illness. And then, mamma, she can back the receipt you spoke of."

Good night, my dear," said Mrs. Leicester, stooping to ther. "Do you feel better for our visit?"

I feel quite well, mamma," was Effen's joyful answer, othing whatever is the matter with me now. Only," she led, laughing, "that I am a little thirsty."

That is soon remedied," said Mr. Castonel. "I will my you some wine and water, Ellen."

"How thankful I am to see your mistress so much better," lained Mrs. Leicester, as she and Mrs. Muff walked

"Ma'am, you cannot be more thankful than I am. I se been upon thorns ever since she was taken ill. Poor s. Castonel—I mean Miss Caroline—having been cut f suddenly by the same illness, was enough to make me afal."

"Poor Caroline!" sighed Mrs. Leicester, with more truth an eaution. "I wish she had lived."

"She is better off," was the reply of the housekeeper. There is nothing but crosses and cares for us who are it. I hope, ma'am, you and Mr. Leicester will come in the now. You can have no conception of the offcet it has had upon my mistress to-night: she is a thousa pounds nearer being well."

Mrs. Leicester turned to her. "Do you think I Custonel makes her a good husband? You and I, M Muff," she added, in tones which seemed to bespeak apole for herself, "knew each other years before this strang ever came near the place, and I speak to you as I won not to others. He seems affectionate, kind, but -what vou think?"

"I cannot answer you, ma'am," replied Mrs. Muff, ( wish I could. Before as he is all kindness to her; a yet I don't know why it should be, but I have my doub of its being sincere. I force the feeling down, and say myself that I was set against Mr. Castonel at the lire through the injury he did my old master. I had r doubts in the same way of his sincerity to his fin wife. And yet, I don't notice it in his manners to othe people.33

"Does he go to see that person now?" asked Mr. Loicestor, lowering her voice.

"Woll, ma'am, I can't say. All I know is, that the other-servant or whatever she may be-who lives with her, was at our house lately."

" Indeed 1"

"It was a night or two before my mistress was taken ill There came a quiet knock at the door. John was out, and Hannah was upstairs, turning down the beds, so I answered it myself. She asked for Mr. Castonel. I did not know her in the dusk, and was about to show her into the study, where master sees his patients, but it flashed over me who it was; and I said Mr. Castonel was not at liberty, and shut the door in her face,"

" Was Mr. Castonel at home?"

He was in the drawing-room with my mistress. And I believe must have seen her from the windows, for he came lownstairs almost directly, and went out."

"Did Ellen-did Mrs. Castonel see her!" breathlessly inquired Mrs. Leicester.

"Ma'nın, I have my doubts she did. No sooner was Mr. Castonel gone, than the drawing-room bell rang, and I went ap. It was for the lamp. While I was lighting it, my mistress said, 'Muff', who was that at the door?'

"That put me in a flutter, but I gathered my wits together, and answered that it was a person from the new shop—for of course I would not tell her the truth."

"What did they want?' asked my mistress.

people had sent in their bill that day. And I took it out of my pocket, and laid it on the table by her.

atterwards, and looking up at the windows?' then questioned my mistress.

- "'Quite impossible for me to tell, ma'am,' I said; and I won't deny that the question took me aback. 'Perhaps they wanted a little fresh air, as it's a warmish night, and the street is open just here?'"
  - "Was that all that passed?" demanded Mrs. Leicester.
- "That was all. Mr. Castonel was not in for two hours afterwards, and I heard him tell my mistress he had been out to a most difficult case. I'll be whipped if I believed him."

"Is he out much in an evening?"

"Very often, he used to be, before my mistress was taken ill. He is always ready with an excuse—it's this patient, or it's that patient, that wants him and keeps him. But I never remember Mr. Winnington to have had these evening calls upon his time."

They reached the parsonage, and entered it. The house keeper was to take back the receipt for some particularly nourishing jelly, which Mrs. Leicester had been recommending for Ellen. It was not immediately found, and Mrs. Muff sat with her in the parlour, talking still. The rector came in from the vestry meeting, and she rose to leave.

Conscious that she had remained longer than was absolutely needful, Mrs. Muff walked briskly homeward. She had gained the door, and was feeling in her pocket for the latch-key—she possessing one, and Mr. Castonel the other—when the door was flung violently open, and the tiger sprang out, for all the world like a real tiger, very nearly upsetting Mrs. Muff, and sending her backwards down the steps.

"You audacious, good-for nothing monkey 1" she exclaimed, giving him a smart box on the ears. "You saw me standing there, I suppose, and did it for the purpose."

"Did I do it for the purpose?" retorted John. "You just go in and see whether I did it for the purpose. I'm regoing to get the horse, and tear off without saddle or riddle for the first doctor I can fetch. It's like as if Mr. Rice had took his two days' holiday just now, a purpose not to be in the town I"

He rushed round towards the stables, and Mrs. Muff entered. Hannah met her with a shrick and a face as white as ashes. "Mrs. Castonel oh, Mrs. Castonel !" was all she cried.

"What is it?" asked the terrified Mrs. Muff.

"It is spasms, or convulsions, or something of the sort," sobbed Hannah; "but I'm sure she's dying! She's taken inst as Miss Caroline was. I am sure she is dying!"

Once more, as connected with this history, rang out the assing-hell of Ebury. And when the startled inhabitants—those who were late sitters-up—opened their doors and ere to learn who had gone to their reckoning, they ank from the answer with horror and dismay. "The young, the beautiful, the second Mrs. Castonel!" And again a funeral started from the house of the surgeon take its way to the church. But this time it was a arger who occupied the elergyman's chariot. deester's task was a more painful one; he followed as cond mourner. Many people were in the churchyard, al their curiosity was intensely gratified at witnessing g violent grief of Mr. Castonel. The rector's emotion as less conspicuous, but his feeble form was bowed, his leps totlered, and his grey hair streamed in the wind. Or he conclusion of the ceremony Mr. Castonel stepped into be mourning couch, solemnly to be conveyed home again tamourning pace; but the rector passed aside and entered he pursonage. The sexton, a spare man in a brown wig, was shovelling in the earth upon the coffin, and shedding lears. He had carried Ellen many a time over the same spot when she was a little child.

CHAPTER V.

THE SIX OREY POWDERS,

A YOUNG and somewhat shy-looking man was making his way down the street of a country village. He appeared to be a stranger, and his clerical coat and white neckeloth betokened his calling. It would seem that he was in search of some house he could not readily find, for he peered curiously at several through his spectacles as he passed them. As he neared one, a handsome house with a green verandah, a cab, painted black, came dashing up, stopped, and there descended from it a gentleman and his servant in the deepest mourning. The stranger approached the master and courteously raised his hat.

"I beg your pardon," he said; "can you obligingly point out to me the Rectory? I understood it to be somewhere here."

"At the end of the street, five minutes lower down. Opposite the church."

** This end of the street?" resumed the stranger, pointing o the way he had been journeying.

"I'll show you which it is with pleasure," cried a fine boy of fourteen, who appeared to be growing out of his jacket.

"What, is it you, Arthur?" said the owner of the cab. "Where did you spring from?"

The young gentleman had sprung from behind the cab, out he did not choose to say so. "I say, sir," he exclaimed, mesing the question, " you have not seen mamma anywhere, myo you?"

"No." "Oh, well, it's not my fault. She told me to meet her somewhere here us I came home from school, and she'd take me to have my hair cut. Old Brooks did not do it to please her last time, so she said she'd go and see it done. Now, sir," he added to the stranger, "Til show you Mr. Loicester's."

They walked along together. "Do you know," said the boy, suddenly looking at his companion, "I can guess wh you are? You are the new curate."

The stranger smiled. "How do you guess that?"

Because you look like it. And we know Mr. Leicester had engaged one: the other did not suit. He is too il now to do it all himself. Mamma says she is sure he won't live long. Do you know Mr. Castonel ?"

"No. Who is Mr. Custonel?"

"Why, that was Mr. Castonel, and that was his cab. Did you see how black they were?"

"Yes. He appeared to be in deep mourning."

- "It is for his wife. She was so pretty, and we all liked her so. She was Ellen Leicester, and Mr. Castonel ra away with her, and she died. That was last spring, and it since then that Mr. Leicester has got so ill. His first witdied too."
  - "Who's first wife?" returned the stranger, scarcely making sense of the boy's tale.

"Are you speaking of the gentleman of whom I inquire my way? He looks young to have had two wives."

"He hus, though. He is a doctor, and has all t He keeps two assistants now. Do you kn practice. Mr. Tuck?"

"I do not know any one in Ebury."

"Oh, don't you? There's Mr. Leicester's," added th lad, pointing to a house, lower down, as they came to turning in the street. "And now I have shown it you, must go back, for if mamma comes and I don't meet he ",qu om wold Hods

"Thank you for bringing me," said Mr. Hurst, "I hop we shall soon be better acquainted. Tell me your name."

"Arthur Chavasse. I am to be what you are, ".nosrad

"Indeed? I hope you will make a good one,"

"I don't know. Last week when I sent the ball through the window and gave Lucy a black eye, papa and mamma were in a passion with me, and they said I had too much devil in me for a parson."

"I am sorry to hear that," was the grave answer.

"I have not got half the devil that some chaps have," continued Master Arthur. "I only leap hedges, and climb trees, and wade streams, and all that. I don't see what harm that can do a fellow, even if he is to be a parson."

"I fear it would seem to point that he might be more fitted for other callings in life."

"Then I just wish you'd tell them so at home. I don't want to be a parson, it's too tame a life for me. Good-bye, sir."

He flow away, a high-spirited, generous had; and the curate-for such he was-looked after him. turned in at the rectory gate. Then he

He was shown into the room where the Reverend bristopher Leicester and his wife were sitting. Two sad, cy-haired people, the former very feeble, but not with age. Arthur Chavasse had given a pretty accurate account of latters. From the time that their only child had run away ith Mr. Castonel, they had been breaking in health; but nce her death, which had occurred six months subsequently, to rector may be said to have been a dying man.

There was certainly a fatality attending the wives of Mr. Castonel, and he appeared to mourn them with sincerity, specially the last. His attire was as black as mourning could be: he had put his cab into black, the crape on his but extended from the brim to the crown, and he wore a mourning pin, and a mourning ring with Ellen's hair in it. He abstained from all gaiety, took a friendly cup of tea occasionally with Mr. and Mrs. Chavasse, and paid a form visit to the Rector and Mrs. Loicester once a month.

The new curate, Mr. Hurst, was approved of by Ebur He was possessed of an amazing stock of dry, book crudition but was retiring and shy to a fault. He took up his about the parish beadle's, who let furnished lodgings, very confortable and quiet. One day he received a visit from Mi Chavasse, a bluff, hearty, good-tempered man, who was steward to the estate of the Earl of Eastbury, a neighbouring nobleman.

"I was talking to Mr. Leicester yesterday," began Mr Chavasse, shaking hands, "and he told me he thought y were open to a reading engagement for an hour or so in t afternoons."

"Gortainly," answered the curate, coughing in the nervous manner habitual to him when taken by surprise "I should have no objection to employing my time in the way, when my duties for the day are over."

"That rescal of a boy of mine, Arthur—the lad has goo abilities, I know, for in that respect he takes after I mother and Frances, yet there are nothing but complain from school about his not getting on."

"Do you not fancy that his abilities may lie in a different direction—that he may be formed by nature for a more bustling life than a clerical one?" the curate ventured to suggest.

"Why, of course, if he has not got it in him, it would be of no use to force him to be a parson; but there's such an Lord Easthury has promised me a living for him. Now it has struck me that if you would come, say at four o'clock, which is the hour he leaves school, and hammer something into him until half-past five, or six, we might see what stuff he is really made of. What de you say ?"

"I could accept the engagement for every evening excepting Saturday," answered Mr. Hurst.

"All right," eried Mr. Chavasse. "One day lost out of the six won't matter. And now, sir, what shall you charge?"

The curate hesitated and blushed, and then named a very low sum.

"If it were not that I have so many children pulling at me, I should say it was too little by half," observed the straightforward Mr. Chavasse; " but I can't stand a high figure. My eldest son has turned out wild, and is a shocking expense to me. Shall we begin on Monday ? "

"If you please. I shall be ready."

" And mind," he added, "that you always stop and take tea with us, when you have no better engagement. tell Mrs. Chavasse to insist on that part of the bargain."

Thus it came to pass that the Reverend William Hurst became very intimate at the house of Mrs. Chavasse.

Autumn, winter, spring passed: and, with summer, things: seemed to be brightening again. We speak of Mr. Custonel. To discarded his gloomy attire, his cale was repainted a charet olour, and he went again into general society. His practice lourished; if he had lost his own wives, he seemed lucky in aving those of other men. His assistants, like himself, ad plenty to do. The gossips began to speculate whether e would marry again, "Surely not!" cried the timid ms, shaking their heads with a shudder; "who would enture to have bim?"

One hot afternoon Mr. Rice, one of the qualified assistantogeons of Mr. Castonel, was walking along a field path. me growing corn, rising on either side of him, was bening, and the gay insects hummed pleasantly. He had at quitted a cottage, one of an humble row called Beech jutages, close by. "Ah, how d'ye do?" eried ho. orely afternoon." " Have "Very." It was the curate who had met him. ion been for ?"

"Only to Gaffer Shipley's. Mr. Castonel received some message this morning about the child; he did not choose to to himself, but sent me."

"Is it ill?" cried the curate, in tones of alarm. ist haptized. I never can get to see the mother about it."

"Ill? no. A trifle feverish. The poor do cram their Mildren with such unwholesome food."

"I am on my way to Thomas Shipley's myself," observed "Mr. Leicester usked me if I had seen him his week, so I thought Pd take a walk this way and call apon a few of them. Mr. Leicester seems to have a great regard for that old man."

"A decent man, I believe, he has been all his life," returned Mr. Rice. "And since his daughter forgot herself, people have wished to show him more respect than before."

"By the way," said the curate, "whose is the child?" Mr. Rice laughed. "You had better ask that question of Mr. Castonel. I don't know."

They shook hands and parted; the surgeon proceeding to the residence of Mr. Custonel, where he busied himself for some little time, making up medicine. He had just conabided his task when Mr. Castonel entered.

"Woll," said he, "what was the matter down af Shipley's?"

"Oh, nothing. Child somewhat feverish and stomacl out of order. I have made up these powders for it. The will set it to rights."

"And that?" added Mr. Castonel, glancing from the powders to a bottle of mixture.

"For Mrs. Acre. I am off now to old Flockaway's,"

As Mr. Rice quitted the laboratory, he met the tiger, "Some medicine to go out, John."

"Where to, sir?"

"Mr. Castonel will tell you. He is there,"

John went into the laboratory. "Mr. Rice says there's some medicine to go out, sir."

Mr. Castonel did not reply immediately. He was writing something on a slip of paper.

"Go to the library," he said, handing it to John, "and inquire whether this book has arrived. If so, bring it."

"Can't I take the medicine at the same time, sir?"

"Do as you are bid, and nothing more," rejoined Mr. Castonel. "Bring me the book, if it is there, and then go with the medicine. You see where it is for; the mixture to Mrs. Acre's, the powders to Thomas Shipley's."

The tiger went off whistling, and his master remained in the laboratory. But when the boy returned, he was no longer there.

"Hannah!" sang out the lad.

"What do you want with Hannah?" demanded the housekeeper, putting her head outside the kitchen-door.

"Bid her tell master as the library says he never ordered the book at all, as they hered on; but if he wants it they can get it from London. Perhaps you'll condescend to tel him yourself, Madam Muff." He took up the medicine as he spoke, and went out again. Meanwhile the Reverend William Hurst had left the cornfeld, and proceeded to Gaffer Shipley's. The Gaffer—as to was styled in the village—lay in his bed in the back from. A fall from a ladder had laid him on it, and he would never rise again. Dame Vaughan was in the front from, sewing. She had been hired to attend the house during a recent illness of Mary Shipley's. "He is askep, ir," she whispered, when she saw the curate about to enter if the dropped off just now, and I think it will do him good."

Mr. Hurst nodded and drew away. He was bound to several cottages in the neighbourhood, so went to them first, and returned afterwards to Shipley's. The Gaffer was awake then.

"I'm ailing much, sir," he said. "Give my humble duty to Mr. Leicester, and thank him for asking. I'm as hot as I can be to-day. My skin feels burning."

"Did you tell this to Mr. Rice? He might have given you something."

"No, sir, I didn't. I had dropped off asleep when L was here, and Dame Vaughan never thought of it. I may be better to-morrow, and then I shu'n't want physic."

As the Guffer spoke, Mr. Hurst saw the entrance of Mr. Castonel's tiger, the door being open between the two rooms. "Powders for somebody, Dame Vaughan," said he. "Who's ill?"

"This little one," replied Dame Vaughan, pointing to the infant on her lap.

"That young scaramouch! I thought, perhaps, the Gaffer might be a going to walk it."

"The Claffer, poor man, ain't at all well," said Dame Vanchau.

"I say," resumed the lad, "where's Mary? What's she gone into hiding for? Nobody have set eyes on her this age. Give her my compliments, and—"

At this moment the boy caught sight of Mr. Hurst. It was quite enough. He touched his hat, backed out, and set off home.

When the curate passed through the front room to leave, he stopped and looked down at the baby. "It does not appear to be very ill, Mrs. Vaughan."

"No, sir, it's as live and peart as can be, this afternoon. I did not see much the matter with it this morning, for my own part, only Mary "—she hesitated—" Mary would send to tell Mr. Castonel."

"Where is Mary ?"

"She's upstairs," whispered the woman. "She made off there, sir, when she saw you a coming. Poor thing, she don't like yet to face the gentlefolks."

As Dame Vaughan spoke, she was opening the packet left by the tiger. It contained six small neat white papers, which her curiosity led her to examine. They disclosed an insignificant portion of grey-coloured powder.

"I know what that is," she observed; "the very best physic you can give to a child. Will you please to read the direction for manying?"

direction for me, sir?"

"'One of these powders to be taken night and morning. Aary Shipley's infant."

"Ah, that's just what Mr. Rice said. Thank you, sir. Good day. I'll tell Mary what you say about bringing the baby to church."

It was then nearly four o'clock, and the curate, after calling in at home to wash his hands and brush his hair, made the best of his way to the house of Mr. Chavasse, scarcely knowing whether he was progressing thither on his head or his heels. That house contained all he could imagine of beauty, and goodness, and love. It was his world. Had he not been a clergyman, he might have said his paradise.

Arthur was already in the study. And when the lessons were over, the curate entered the drawing-room, he and his fattering heart. There she was, with her graceful form, her fine features, and her dark, brilliant eye. For him there was but one levely face on earth, and it was that of Frances Chavasse.

To him she was a perfect contrast. Open in manner, really and pleasant in speech, the Reverend William Hurst, when he first knew her, could only gaze at her through his spectacles with annual admiration. She detected his homege; she soon detected his love; and, true to her vain nature, she gave it encouragement. Vanity was Frances Chavasse's ruling passion. She was this evening attired in a pink muslin dress, very pretty and showy, and when Mr. Hurst entered she was standing before the glass, putting some fresh-gathered roses into her dark hair. That poor benting heart of his leaped into his mouth at the sight.

"See what I am doing?" she said, perceiving his approach in the glass. "For fun."

He took the hand she carelessly extended behind, took it, and chaped it, and retained it: for it had come, now, that he no longer strove so arduously to conceal his love.

"Are they not pretty roses, Mr. Hurst? I plucked them off that tree by the lower garden. You know it: Here's just one left. I will give it to you."

"And I," he whispered, taking it from her hand, "will keen it for ever."

"Oh," cried Frances, laughing, "what a collection you must have, if you have kept all I have given you! You might set up a museum of dried flowers."

Arthur ran in, and looked at the table with a blank face.

"Why is ten not ready? It has struck six."

"Manuna has gone out: we shall not have ten till she comes home," answered Frances. "Papa has not come in either."

"Then I can't wait," cried Arthur, ruefully. "I sha'n't wait."

"I would faint if I were you," retorted Frances, "I know you must be famished: though you did take enough dinner for six, at one o'clock."

"I want to be off to cricket," returned the lad. "I shall get my tea in the kitchen. What have you been sticking those things in your head for?"

"For you to admire."

"Ah! I expect it is for somebody else to admire. Take care, sir," added the boy, significantly; "she will flirt your heart out, and then turn round and say she didn't mean it."

A glimpse of angry passion flushed into the face of Frances. But Arthur escaped from the room.

"Don't mind him," whispered the carate. "All boys are the same."

"All are not the same," said Frances, crossly. "Were you the same when you were young?"

"I nover had a sister," sighed the curate. He drew her hand within his arm, and they rambbed into the garden, fe had long been serewing up his courage to speak more eriously to her, and he thought he would do it now.

"I hope I shall not always remain a curate," he began, by way of introduction.

"I hope not," assented Frances.

"If I were to" here he was stopped by his nervous cough—"to go into housekeeping, how much do you think it would take?"

"Housekeeping? I suppose you mean, set up a house and keep servants?"

"Yes," coughed the curate. "Were I lucky month to min a preferment of two hundred a year, would it 12.17

"You would have hard work to spend it all, you yourself. 33k at that line tree: pretty, is it not?"

"Not by myself," returned the curate, a rosy hue on his in check. "If I had --- one to share it with me?" "That's another thing," said Frances, with a laugh. She might be fond of dress and nonsense, as I am, and en she would spend you out of house and home."

"Oh, Frances !" he murmured, his nervous tone giving ace to an impassioned one, as he clasped her hands in his, ad turned his spectacles lovingly upon her face, "I know ought not yet to speak of it; but give me a hope—that, hould the time come when I am justified in asking for ou, I shall not ask in vain."

Frances drew her hands away, and speeded towards the "It will be soon enough to talk of that when the ine does come," was her light answer. To the simple mind of Mr. Hurst it conveyed all he wished for.

Mrs. Chavasse came in. And searcely had they sat down to ten, when one of the servants appeared and said that a boy wanted Mr. Hurst. and the Market of the contract of the co

"Don't disturb yourself!", oried, Mr. Chavasse, as the earate was rising. "Let Nancy ask what he wants." each

"It is Ned Long, the mason's boy from Beech Cottages, golden i sambele se i 🚾 said the servant. "What can he want?" wondered the curate. "I gave them relief to-day."

"Soud him round to the window, Nancy," said Mr.

A young ragamustin, in a very dilapidated state of clothes, Chavasso. was soon discerned approaching the large window, which was open to the ground. He took off an old blue cap, and displayed a shock head of light hair. "What is it, Ned?" eried the curate.

"Please, sir," answered the lad, lifting his sunburnt freekled countenance, "I have been to Mr. Leicester's, and he telled me to come and ask whether Mr. Hurst was here.

"Well, you see I am," replied Mr. Hurst, with a half smile.

- "He said, please, as I was to tell you what I had telled him, and would you go on quick, and he'd get a fly and come after, but he was too bad to walk."
  - "Go where?" cried the curate. "To Mr. Leicestor's ?"

"No, sir, to Gaffer Shipley's. He's took awful."

"How? Is he worse?"

"He's a dying, sir: Dame Vaughan said I was to say so He can't hold hisself still on his bed for screeching. the babby's a dying and a screeching; it's on Dame Vaughan's lap, it is, and she says they won't be alive many minutes, and it's the physic as she give 'em."

They had risen, all of them, and gathered round the window, looking at the boy. Mrs. Chavasae spoke, in her sharp, lasty way.

"What is it you are saying, Ned Long ? Pell your talk properly. Who is it that is dying down at Shipley's ? "

"The Gaffer, ma'am, and the baldry."

" Both ?"

" Yes, ma'am,"

"I never heard of such a thing. You must have brought your tale wrong, boy,"

"Damo Vanghan says as it's the physic."

"What physic?"

"I doesn't know,"

"I never saw such a stupid boy! who is to make out what he means I" irritably repented Mrs. Chavasse, her curiosity foroibly excited. "Mr. Hurst ---- Why, where's Mr. Hust 2 If., L...

He had, and was striding over the ground towards Thomas hipley's cottage. A strange scene presented itself there, he haby was lying dead, and the old man on his bed sened in danger of dissolution. "What is the cause of his?" questioned the curate.

"I don't know what's the cause," sobbed Dame Vaughan.

Thope no blume won't be laid to me."

It appeared that the Gaffer had had his tea at four o'clock, ad seemed refreshed and better after it. At six, when have Vaughan undressed the infant, she remarked that it appeared so well as scarcely to need the powder.

"Suppose we give father one of the powders?" suggested Mary, a modest-looking, gentle girl, who, until recent events, and been in high favour in the village. "If they are fever powders, it might do him good; and it couldn't do him barm, any way."

"Ay, sure; it's a good thought," assented Dame Vaughan.
"We'll give him one to-night and another in the morning.
This child won't want 'em all."

So they mixed up two powders, giving old Shipley hi first, lest he should fall asleep; and the other to the child. Soon after the latter had swallowed it, it began to scream, and writhe, and toss convulsively. Its legs were drawn up, and then stretched out stiff, whilst its face, to use Dame Vaughan's words, was not then the face of a baby. The neighbours came flocking in, and, suddenly, sounds were heard from Gaffer Shipley's bed: he was screaming and writhing like the child. Widow Thorpe's boy was despatched for Mr. Custonel, and another as we have seen, to Mr. Leicester's.

The hoy, Thorpe, was flying along, proud to be of service and full of excitement when, by a piece of good fortune, which Dame Vaughan declared she should ever be thankful which Dame Vaughan declared she should ever be thankful the lodge, where the strange lady lives," said the boy, att wards, "and, if he had been a waiting for me, he could have been a standing out better." The boy made up him, panting, "Please, sir, will you run down to Gaff Shipley's ?"

"What for ?" asked Mr. Castonel.

"They are both howling horrid, sir, says it must have been the powders as they took." Dame Vaugha

"Both who?" quickly domanded Mr. Castonel.

"Mary Shipley's little 'un and the Gaffer, sir, om a powder apiece, and mother says----They giv

"What the !" burst forth Mr. Castonel, glaving of the boy. "Who gave one to old Shipley ?"

Master Thorpe shrank aside. He did not, just then, like the face of Mr. Castonel. "Here," added the surgeon writing a line on the leaf of his pocket-book, and tearing it out, "take that to my house. Mr. Rice will give you some thing to bring down. Run all the way."

The hoy ran one way, Mr. Castonel ran the other. flow over the ground at his utmost speed, and was soon at the cottage. The buby was dead : Mary was stretched over it, sobbing and orying, and the gossile were crying over her.

"Now, the first thing, a clearance," exclaimed the surgeon, "and then I may come to the bottom of this. Leave the ottage, every one of you,"

He held the door open and the women filed out. e turned to Dame Vaughan. "Have you any warm water?"

"Not a drop, sir," she sobled, " and the fire's out. It was the powders, and it couldn't have been nothing else. Mr. Rice must have sent poison in mistake for wholesome

"I should think not," remarked Mr. Castonol. see those that are left. Mary," he irritable added adont band moan in that way; that will do no good. One, two, hen four. Are these all ?"

"Six come, and "All, sir," replied Dame Vaughan. guis the four what's left."

Mr. Castonel carried them in his hand through the room here Thomas Shipley was lying, and went out to the back 30, which he closed after him, and examined them, alone, the yard. Possibly for greater light.

"There's nothing wrong with these powders," he said, then he returned. " However, Dame Vaughan, you had ast take charge of them, in case they should be asked for." "I'll book 'one up in Mary's drawer," she sobbed. "I how it was the powders, and I'll stick to it till I drops."

*Do so at once. Here, take them. And then go amongst he neighbours and see if you can borrow some warm water. If we can get a quart of it down the Gaffer's throat, till shat I have sent for comes, so much the better.

there are you off to?" "I thought you told me to fetch some warm water," aswered Damo Vanghan, arresting her footsteps.

"But I did not tell you to leave the key in the drawer. The powders are perfectly harmless, but it may be as well, is justice to Mr. Rice, to let other people think so."

Mr. Hice and young Thorpe came together, full polt, and it was soon after their entrance that Mr. Hurst appeared. When the Caffer had been attended to, Damo Yaughan returned to the powders.

"The powders were all right," said Mr. Rice. stake my life upon it. Where are they? They were only hydrargyrus cum creta," he added to Mr. Castonel.

"I know they were. I have examined them."

Dame Vaughan unlocked the drawer, and put the powdon the table before Mr. Rice. He opened all four of The curate, Mr. Castonel, and Dame Vaugl stood and watched him. "These are the powders I so he observed. "They are quite right. They are only common grey-powder, Dame Vaughan."

Dame Vaughan still looked unconvinced.

"Let her take charge of them," said Mr. Castonel. may be more satisfactory."

"Is it possible," interposed the curate, "that the power can in any way have been changed ?--wrong ones admit

Mr. Castonel turned his eye upon him, an eye that lool as if it would have liked to strike him dead as a child. "? sir," he coldly said, "I should think it is not possible. I you wish to cast a suspicion on Mrs. Vaughan ?"

"Nay," cried the curate, "certainly not. I would a east a suspicion upon any one. It was but an idea th occurred to me, and I spoke it out."

Gaffer Shipley recovered, the baby was buried, and th affair remained a mystery. A mystery that has never bec positively solved. Other medical men, upon being presse into the inquiry, pronounced the powders to be an innocer and proper medicine, frequently given to children.

. That same night, at an early starlight hour, France Chavasse was lingering still in their garden. frequently towards a side-gate, by which visitors who were familiar with the house sometimes entered. that she was restless; anxions; impatient. Whoever shi was expecting, kept her waiting long. Was it Mr. Hurst? It was not Mr. Hurst who entered; it was Mr. Castonel. What I were they lovers ? Surely yes; for he strained her to his heart, and held her to him, and covered her face with his impassioned kisses ; as he had, in other days, ay, even in that same garden strained to him Caroline Hall and Ellen Leicester. Was his love for her genuine? Had it been so for his former wives? No matter: theirs had been for

It and neither had loved him more fervently than did mes Chayasse. Verily Mr. Castonel must have possessed was of fascination unknown to other men! Frances played heraelf off upon the unhappy curate, partly to slify her vanity, partly as a blind, for she and Mr. gonel had long had an understanding in secret.

"The Reverend William Hurst has been explicit to-night," Mapored Frances in mocking tones.

"The fool !" interrupted Mr. Castonel; and the glare of Boye was such as it had been twice before, that evening. bances did not see it; the was learning on his breast,

"He asked me how much it would take to keep two," she ant on, haughing. "And would I have him if he were green a rich living of two hundred a year. Gervase, I bink, I do think, he will nearly die when-when-he

"I hope he will," flereely uttered Mr. Castonel. "Frances, atime is drawing near that I shall speak to your father." "Yet a little longer," she sighed. "He happened to say, ly last night, that it seemed but yesterday since Ellen ed. Manuan must break it to him, whenever it is spoken . She can turn him round her little finger,"

CHAPTER VI.

A VAIN REMONSTRANCE.

ONE Saturday afternoon, in September, the Reverend Christopher Leicester sent for his curate. It was to inform him that he found himself unable to preach on the morrow, as had been his intention.

"Are you worse?" imquired Mr. Hurst.

"A little thing upsets me now, and I have heard some news to-day, which, whether true or not, will take me days to get over, for it has brought back to me too foreibly one who is gone. Who is that?" quickly added the rector, as a shout was heard outside the window.

"It is only Arthur Chavasae. I met him at the gate, and he ran in with me,"

"Let him come in, let him come in," cried Mr. Leicester, eagerly. "He can tell me if it be true."

Mr. Hurst called to him.

"How are you, sir?" said Arthur, holding out his hand, "And how is Mrs. Leicester?"

The rector shook his head. "As well, my boy, as we can expect to be on this side the grave. Arthur, when you shall be as I am, health and strength gone, there is only one thing that will give you comfort."

"And what's that, sir ?" asked Arthur, fearlessly.

"The remembrance of a well-spent life; a conscience at says you have done good in it, not evil. Good to ar fellow-creatures, for Christ's sake, Who did so much ad for you."

"But are we to have no play?" inquired Arthur, whose eas of "doing good," like those of too many others, youred only of gloom.

"Ah, play; play, my hoy, while you may; youth is the ason for it. But, in the midst of it, love your fellow-reatures: he ever ready to do them a kindness: should by functed injury rise up in your heart whispering you o return evil for evil, oh! yield not to the impulse. You all be thankful for it when your days are numbered."

"Yes, sir. There's a boy outside has gone off with my ricket-but. It's Tom Chewton. I was going after him a give him a drubbing. Perhaps I had better make him and over the but, and leave the drubbing out?"

"Certainly," replied Mr. Leicester, whilst the curate braned away his head to hide a smile, "Arthur, I have beard to-day that you are going to lose your sister Frances."

o To lose her! " echoed the boy. "Oh yes, I know what you mean. And I am sure it's true, although Mrs. Frances is so sty over it, else why should she be having such heaps of new clothes? I said to her the other day, 'I reckon I shall get some rides inside the cub now, instead of behind it,' and she turned scarlet and threw a cushion at me."

"It is really so, then ! that she marries Mr. Castonel 4"

"He has been making love to her this past year, only they did it on the sly," continued Arthur. "I saw. She's always interfering with us boys: we shall have twice the fun when she's gone. Where's Mr. Hurst?"

"Take this, Arthur," cried the rector, handing him a fine pear which was on the table. "Good-bye, my lad."

Thank you, sir. Good-bye. I'll leave out Tom Chew-ton's drubbing."

Arthur ran out. Mr: Hurst stood at the end of the path against the iron railings. "Isn't this a stunning pear ... Why, what's the matter, sir?"

"A spasm," gasped the curate. "Run off to your play fellows, Arthur."

"Will you cat this pear, sir?" said the boy, gazing with concern at his white face. "It may do you good. I have only taken one bite out of it."

"No, no my lad. Eat it yourself, and run away."

Arthur did as he was bid, and the miserable elergymen, feeling himself what he was, a dupe, dragged his footsteps towards his home. The sun shone brilliantly, but the heart's sunshine had gone out from him for ever,

The news took Ebury by surprise. What I marry Frances Chavasse, the early friend of his two first wives I. Some of them remembered the nonsensical declaration attributed to Mr. Castonel when he first came to Ebury—that only one of the three young ladies was to his taste, but he would marry them all. The "one" being generally supposed to indicate Ellen Leicester.

The preparations, commenced for the marriage, were on an extensive scale. The tiger flew one day into the kitchen at his master's with the news that there was a new chariot in the course of construction, and that he was no longer to be a despised tiger in buttons, but a footman in a splendid livery.

"A pretty footman you will make!" was the slighting response of the housekeeper, whilst Hannah suspended her ironing in admiration.

"And the new coachman's to be under me," he continued, dancing round in a circle three feet wide. "Of course I shall have the upper hand of him. So don't you go for to disparage me before him, Madam Muff, if you please,"

"Did muster may be was to be under you?" inquired tamah.

annah.

"It's to be such a gorgeous livery," the tiger went on, with spangled vests to match. The control of them two, with spangled vests to match. Indicate going to be a new lady's maid, Mrs. Muff, ser you."

"John I" uttered the housekeeper, in a tone of warning.

"She's hired o' purpose," persisted the tiger, dodging tof Mrs. Muft's way, and improving upon his invention.

And the house is to be gutted of this precious shabby old smiture, and bran-new put in, from cellar to garret. The sids is to be of silk, and the tables of ivory, and the walls to be gilded, and one o' the rooms is to have a glass for, that Miss Chayasse may see her feet in it. I know shat—if muster is determined to have her, he's paying for her."

He dodged away, for Mrs. Muff's countenance was growing dinous. But, setting aside a few inaccuracies, inventions, d embeltishments of his own, the tiger's information was the whole correct; and Mrs. Chavasse and her daughter relifted out of their ordinary realm into one that savoured at of sober reality. They revelled in fine clothes making in Frances, in the luxurious establishment proparing to seeive her, in the wondering admiration of Ebury; and hey revelled in the triumph over Mrs. Leicester. If her laughter had once been preferred to Frances, their turn had some now; there had been no costly furniture, or painted carriages, or superfluity of servants prepared for Ellen.

These preparations, in all their magnitude, burst without warning upon the astonished senses of Mr. Chavasse. He turned all over in a cold perspiration, and went storming into the presence of his wife and daughter. Mrs. Chavasse into the presence of his wife and daughter. her husband always, as she expressed it, "managed" her husband consequently she had taken her own time for telling him; but it happened that he heard the news from another quarter. We allude more particularly now to the pomp and show contemplated for the wedding-day; it was that raised the ire of Mr. Chavasse.

"What a couple of born idiots you must be! I have been told Frances is going to have four bridesmaids."

"Well?"

"And a heap of noise and parade: horses and carriages, and servants and favours---"

"Now don't put yourself out," equably interposed Mrs. Chavasse.

"And not satisfied with all that, you are going to have flowers strewed up the churchyard path for her to walk upon!" And his voice almost rose to a shout. "Hadn't you better have a carpet haid down through the street?"

"I did think of that," was Mrs. Chavasse's cool reply.

"Goodness be gracious to me! The place will think I have turned fool, to suffer it."

"Let them," said Mrs. Chavasse. "Her wedding does not come every day,"

"I had a misgiving that something was going on, I declare I had, when you badgered me into asking Lord Eastbury to give her away," continued Mr. Chavasse, rubbing his heated face. "I wish I hadn't. What a fool he'll think me! A land-steward's daughter marrying a country surgeon, and coming out in this style! It's disgusting."

"My dear, you'll make yourself ill. Speak lower.

Frances, this is the wrong pattern."

"And that's not the worst of it. Mrs. Chavasse, listen, for I will be heard. It is perfectly harbarous to enact all this in the eyes of the Rector and Mrs. Leicester. I shall never be able to look them in the face again."

"You'll get over that."

"Any one but you would have a woman's feelings on the matter. I tell you it is nothing less than a direct figult to them—a wicked triumph over their dead child. You ought to shrink from it, Frances, if your mother does not."

But poor Mr. Chavasse could gain no satisfaction from either, though he nearly talked himself into a fever. Mrs. Chavasse always had been mistress, and always would be. Everybody, save Mrs. Chavasse herself, thought and knew that what she was doing was ridiculous and absurd. Even Mr. Chavasse, and the wedding-day rose in triumph. It was a sunny day in December, less cold than is usual: but Ebury was in too much excitement to think of cold. Never had such a wedding been seen there. You might have walked on the people's heads all round the church, and inside the church you could not have walked at all. When the crowd saw the flowers on the narrow path between the graves—lovely flowers from the gardens of Eastbury—they asked each other what could possess Mrs. Chavasse.

The bridal procession started. The quiet carriage of the dean of a neighbouring cathedral city led the way. He was an easy, good-natured dean, loving good cheer, even when it came in the shape of a wedding-breakfast, and Mrs it came in the shape of a wedding-breakfast, and Mrs Chavasse had manceuvred to get him to officiate, "to meet the Earl of Eastbury," so his carriage headed the van. But, ah, reader I whose equipage is this which follows? It is new and handsome, the harness of its fine horses glitters with orunnents, the purple-and-drab liveries of its servants look wonderful in the sun. Mr. Castonel'its servants look wonderful in the sun. Mr. Castonel'in as ever to the general eye, sits within it. Behind—can it be?—yes, it is our old friend the tiger, a really good-looking youth in his new appurtenances; his dignity, however, is somewhat marred by the familiar nods and winks he bestows upon his friends in the crowd. Now comes the fashionable carriage of the Earl of Eastbury, with its showy emblazonments and its prancing steeds. The bride sits in it, with her vanity, and her beauty, and her rich attire; Lord Eastbury (as good-natured a man as the dean) is opposite to her, lounging carclessly; Mrs. Chavasse, puffed up with pride, looks out on all sides, demanding the admiration of the spectators; and Mr. Chavasse sits with a red face, and does not dare to look at all, for he is thoroughly ashamed of the whole affair, and of the string of carriages yet to come.

The intention of Mr. and Mrs. Leicester to leave home for the day had been frustrated, for the rector had slipped down some stairs the previous night and injured his ankle. They sat at home in all their misery, listening to the gav show outside, and to the wedding-hells. The remembrance of their lost child was wringing their hearts: her loving childhood, her endearing manners, her extreme beauty, her disabeliance, and her melancholy death. Verily this pomp and pagemitry was to them an insult, as Mr. Chavasse had said; an inexcusable and bitter mockery. It was Ellen's husband that was being made happy with another, it was Ellen's early friend who was now to usurp her place. Oh, Mrs. Chavasse I did it never once occur to you that day, to read a lesson from the past? You sat by your child's side, swelling with folly and exultation, but did no warning, no shadow fall upon you? Already had Mr. Castonel wedded two flowers as fair as alic, and where were they? No, no; the imagination of Mrs. Chavasse, at its widest range, nover extended to so dreadful a fate as that for Frances.

"What with weddings and buryings, he has played t blerable part at this church," observed one of the mob, gazing after Mr. Castonel.

Yes, he had: but he made the marriage responses as clearly and firmly as though he had never made them to others, then lying within a few yards of him. He knelt here, and vowed to love and cherish her, and when the asks were irrevocably fastened he led her out through as admiring crowd, over the crushed flowers, to the new arriage. John, not a whit less vain, just then, than his new mistress, held the door open, and Frances entered it, she could not have told whether her pride was greater at aking her seat, for the first time, in a chariot of her own, or during the few minutes that she had occupied the geroneted carriage of Lord Eastbury.

More pomp, more display, more vanity at the breakfast, where Frances sat on Lord Eastbury's right hand, and Mrs. Chaynese on that of the dean, and then the new carriage drew up again, with four horses and two postboys, and Hannah, instead of John, seated behind it. A little delay, to the intense gratification of the assembled mob, and Mr. and Mrs. Castonel came out and entered it, to be conveyed on the first stage of their honeymoon. A singular circumstance occurred as they were whirled along. Leaning over a roadside gate, and looking openly at the chariet, watching for it, with a scornful triumph on her handsome face, stood the strange lady who inhabited the lodge. She waved her hand at Mr. Castonel, and the latter, with a sudden rush of red to his impassive countenance, leaner back in his carriage, Frances did not speak; she say it: but the time had searcely come for her to inquire part culars about his mysterious relation. Ere Mr. Caston had well recovered his equanimity, they flow past anoth gate, and there, peeping only, and concealing herself much as possible, rose the pale, sad face of Ms

CHAPTER VII.

A WEDDING-PEAL.

A GENIAL Christmas-eve, bright and frosty, and merrily plazed the fire in a comfortable kitchen of one of the best houses in a country village. It was the residence of the surgeon, and he was out on his wedding-tour, having just espoused his third wife.

They were expected home that night, and preparations for the following day's feast were being actively presided over by the housekeeper, Mrs. Muff, a staid, respectable personage, much above the grade of a common servant She was very busy, standing at the table, when the surgeon tiger (we must still call him so, though he had recentiassumed the garb of a footman) came into the kitchen drew a chair right in front of the great fire, and sat down, as though he meant to roast himself.

"John," said Mrs. Muff, "I'll trouble you to move from there."

John sat on, without stirring.

"Do you hear?" repeated the housekeeper. "I want t come to the fire every minute, and how can I do so wit. you planted there?"

"What a shame it is!" grumbled John, drawing himself and his chair away, for he was completely under the dominion of Mrs. Muff. "Whoever heerd of cooking a dinner the night afore you want to eat it?-except the pudding."

"I must put things forward, and do what can be done there will be too much left for to-morrow, even then, with all the Chavasses dining here. For I don't stop away from service on Christmas-day for any one. I never did yet, and I'm not going to begin now."

The tiger screwed up his mouth, as if giving vent to a long whistle: taking care that no sound of it reached the cars of Mrs. Muff.

- "You can take the holly and dress the rooms. Saving enough, mind, for the kitchen. And then, John, you car lay the cloth in the dining-room, and carry in the tea-things."
  - "There's lots of time for that," returned John.
- "It has struck eight, and Mr. Castonel's letter said nine Do as I bid you."

She was interrupted by the sound of young voices, rising in song, outside.

- "There's another set!" cried John, indignantly. "That makes the third lot we have had here to-night."
- "When they have finished, you may look out and bring me word how many there are," said Mrs. Muff.

John left the kitchen, his arms full of holly and evergreen. Presently he came back.

"There's no less than five of them little devils."

Mrs. Muff, with a stern reprimand, dived into her pockets, and brought forth five halfpence. "Give them one apiece, John."

"If it was me, now, as was missis, instead of you, I should favour 'em with a bucket of water from a upstairs window," was John's response, as he ungraciously took the halfpence. "They'll only go and send others. Suppose master and missis and the new carriage should just drive up, and find them rascallions a squeaking round the door!"

"Christmas would not be Christmas without its carols," returned Mrs. Muff. "I remember, the first winter you gre down here, you came on the same errand to old Mr. simington's, and got a mince-pie and a penny out of me."

"Ah." replied John, "but I was a young donkey then."

It was past ten when the carriage rolled up to the door. John flew to open it, and Mrs. Muff, in her black silk gown and white apron, stood in the hall, drawing on her leather aittens. Frances, Mrs. Castonel, happy and blooming, grang from the carriage and entered her new home. Mrs. Muff led the way to the dining-room. It looked bright and cheering, with its large fire, its blazing lamps, and well-spread table, half supper, half tea. "I will go upstairs first," said the young bride, "and take these wraps off."

Mr. Castonel came in, a slight man of middle height, sarcely yet five-and-thirty, and the tiger followed him. "Well, John," said he, "how has Mr. Rice got on with the patients?"

"Pretty well, sir. None of 'em be dead, and some be well. But they have been a grumbling."

"Grumbling! What about?"

"They say if a doctor gets married, he has no right to go away like other folks, and that this is the third time you have served 'em so. It was gouty old Flockaway said the most. He have had another attack; and he was so cranky Mr. Rice wouldn't go anigh him, and he can't abear Mr. Tuck."

The surgeon laughed. "What's coming in for tea,

"Some muffins, sir. And Mrs. Muff says she knows as that will be one of the best tongues you have cut into."

"Bring tea in at once. It is late."

As the tiger withdrew, Mrs. Castonel entered. Her hasband's arms were open to receive her. "Oh, Gervase," she exclaimed, "how kind of you to have everything in such beautiful order for me 1"

"Welcome, a thousand times welcome to your home, my love!" he whispered. "May it ever appear to you as bright as it does now!"

Loving words; loving manner! But, alas! they had been proffered before, with the same apparently earnest sincerity; once to Caroline Hall, and again to sweet Ellen Leicester.

"If you don't send in them muffins, ma'am, without further delay, master says he'll know the reason why," was the tiger's salutation to Mrs. Muff.

She was buttering them, and listening to Hannah's account of the journey, for she had attended Mrs. Castonel. She turned to give him the plate, but stopped and started, for the church bells had rung out a joyous peal.

"It cannot be midnight!" she exclaimed.

"Midnight!" sareastically echoed the tiger. "It wants a good hour and a half o' that. There's the clock afore you."

"Then what possesses the bells?"

"Well, you be rightly named," returned the tiger, "for you be a muff, a out-and-outer. Them bells is for master and missis; not for Christmas, I know. The ringers is sitting up, and heard the carriage rattle up the street. Hark, how they are clapping the steam on! They'll think to get a double Christmas-box from master."

Just before Mr. Castonel went to his room that night the bells again struck out. They were ringing-in Christmas. He stood and listened to them, a peculiar expression in his unfathomable eyes, his passionless face, whose emotions were so completely under control. Was he speculating upon what the next year should bring forth ere those Christmas bells should again sound? The next year! The clock struck out: he counted its strokes: Twelve! Then he took his candle and went upstairs. And the bells began again.

"A merry Christmas to you, Frances," he said, as he attend the chamber; "a merry Christmas, and many of hem."

"Thank you," she laughed. "I think it must be a good men to receive these wishes the moment it comes in."

Whilst she was speaking, a loud summons was heard at he house-door. It was a messenger for Mr. Castonel, from me of his best patients. He hurried out, and Mrs. Castonel composed herself to sleep.

A singular dream visited Mrs. Castonel. She thought she was sporting in her girlhood's days, in her father's large old garden, with her companions, Caroline Hall and Ellen Leicester. How gay they were, how happy: for the sense of present happiness was greater than ever Frances had experienced in reality; ay, although she had married where she passionately loved. They were dressed as if for a rejoicing, all in white, but the materials of her own attire appeared to be of surpassing richness. A table, laid out for asting, was lighted by a lamp; but a lamp that gave a lost brilliant and unearthly light, overpowering the glare f day. The table and lamp in her own dining-room that light had probably given the colouring to this part of her The garden was not exactly like her father's, either; in form alone it bore a resemblance to it; it was more what Frances had sometimes imagined of Eden flowers, birds, light, and the sensation of joyous gladnes all were too beautiful for earth. The banquet appeared be waiting for them, whilst they waited the presence another. He came; it was Gervase Castonel. He advan with a smile for all, and beckoned them to take their pla at table. A fierce jealousy arose in Frances's heart: business had he to smile upon the others? But, ir ceptibly, the others were gone, without Frances I noticed the manner of their departure. The old ha came back again; the ecstatic sense of bliss in the present. and she put her arm within his, to walk round that lovely garden. Then she remembered her companions, and asked Mr. Castonel where they had gone to. He said he would show her; and, approaching a door in the hedge, pushed it open. Frances looked out, and the fearful contrast to the lovely spot she had quitted, struck the most terrifying agony to her breast; for, beyond, all was utter darkness. She shrank back with a shudder, but Mr. Castonel with a fiendish laugh pushed her through, and a voice called out, "To your doom! to your doom!" If his voice, it was much Frances awoke with the horror, but the most altered. heavenly music was sounding in her cars; so heavenly, that it chased away her terror, and she thought herself again in that happy garden.

She half opened her eyes; she was but half awake, and still were heard the strains of that sweet music. Had she gone to sleep, and awakened in heaven? for surely such music was never heard on earth. The thought occurred to her in her half-conscious state. The music died away in the air, and Frances sat up in bed, and rubbed her eyes, and wondered; and just then Mr. Castonel returned. "What is it?" she cried, bewildered; "what is it?"

"The Waits," replied Mr. Castonel. "What did you think it was, Frances?"

"Only the Waits!" And then, with a rushing fear, came back the dreadful part of her ominous dream; and she broke into sobs and strove to tell it him.

But these night-terrors pass away with the light of day: sometimes pass and leave no sign, even in remembrance.

The heads and eyes of Ebury were turned towards a gay and handsome chariot that went careering down the street, attended by its coachman and footman. A lady and tleman were in it, she in brilliant attire: Mr. and Mrs. tonel were returning their wedding visits. It stopped he gate of the rectory.

Don't stay long, Frances," he whispered to her. "I avs feel frozen into stone when I am in the presence of se two old people."

Mrs. Castonel smiled, and sailed into the rectory drawingm in all her finery; but she really did, for a moment. get her triumph, when she saw the saddened look of poor s. Leicester, and the mourning robes still worn for Ellen. s. Leicester had not paid, as it was called, the wedding it; she had felt unequal to it; her card and an apology illness had been her substitutes. Frances sat five minutes. d from thence the carriage was ordered to her old home. encountered Mr. Hurst: he took off his hat, and the I colour flushed his cheek. Frances alone returned a how.

Mrs. Chavasse was in no pleasant temper. She was umbling at her husband, because he had kept dinner ating. He was standing before the fire in his velveteen at and leather gaiters, warming his frostbitten hands.

"I can't help it," said he. "If I were to neglect Lord astbury's business he would soon get another steward, al where would you all be then? You have been making ills, I suppose, Frances?"

"Only at the rectory, papa."

Mr. Chavasse turned sharply round from the fire, and seed his daughter.

"The rectory! In that trim!"

Frances felt annoyed. "What trim? What do you pean, papa ?"

"I should have gone in a quiet way, to call there," returned Mr. Chavasse. "Gone on foot, and left some # three operaws and bracelets at home. You might have stepped in and taken a quiet cup of tea with them: anything of that sort."

"In the name of wonder, what for?" sharply spoke up Mrs. Chavasse. "Frances has gone just as I should have gone."

Mr. Chavasse did not continue the subject. "Will you stay and take some dinner, Frances?"

- "And find it half cold," interposed Mrs. Chavasse.
- "I would not stay for the world, papa. I have other calls to make and Emily Lomax is coming to dine with me afterwards, that we may by down the plans for my ball. It will be such a beautiful ball, papa: the best ever given in Ebury."
- "Mind you have plenty of wax-lights, Frances," advised her mother.
- "Oh, I shall have everything; lights, and hot-house plants, and champagne in abundance. Gervase let's me have it all my own way."
- "Do not begin that too soon," said Mr. Chavasse, nodding at his son-in-law.
- "Where's the use of contradiction?" laughed the surgeon, as they rose to leave:
  - "For when a woman will, she will, you may depend on't,
    And when she won't, she won't; and there's an end on't."

Frances Castonel was just then the envy of Ebury, at least of all who considered ease and gaiety the only happiness of life. Parties at home, parties abroad; dress, jewels, equipage, show; not a care clouded her countenance, not a doubt of the future fell on her mind; and the shadows of those who were gone haunted her not.

One wet day, at an early hour, when she was not likely to meet other visitors, Mrs. Leicester called. She had thought by delay to gain composure; but it failed her; and, after greeting Frances, she hid her face in her hands and burst into bitter tears. "You must forgive me, Frances," she sobbed. "The time I entered this house it was for the purpose of mg my child in h r coffin."

Frances felt dreadfully uncomfortable, wondering what goodld say, and wishing the visit were over. As ill-luck odd have it, she had been hunting in a lumber closet that orning, and had come upon a painting and two drawings, me by the late Mrs. Castonel. One of them bore her me in the corner, "Ellen Castonel." Frances had carried em down in her hand and put them on the table, wishing, w, she had put them in the fire instead.

"These are poor Ellen's," exclaimed Mrs. Leicester, as reve fell on them. "She did them just before her death. have wondered what became of them, but did not like to k. Would you mind giving me one, Frances? This ith her name on it: it is her own writing."

"All-take them all, dear Mrs. Leicester."

"I would thankfully do so, but perhaps Mr. Castonel dues them."

"Indeed, no," answered Frances, with inexcusable want feonsideration; "you may be sure he has never looked at sem since they were done. I rummaged them out of an li lumber closet this morning."

Mrs. Leicester took the drawings in silence, and then not the hand of Frances. "I am but a poor hand at simpliments now," she murmured, "but I entreat you to elieve. Frances, that you have my best wishes for your reffare, as sincerely as I wished it for my own child. May an and Mr. Castonel be ever happy."

About this time rumours began to be circulated in Ebury that a medical gentleman, who was formerly in practice in it, was about to return.

"You had better take care of your p's and q's," cried old Flockaway one day to Mr. Rice. "If it's true that Ailsa is coming back, I wouldn't give a hundred a year for the practice that will be left for Mr. Castonel."

"How so?" demanded the assistant-surgeon, who had been a stranger to the place when Mr. Ailsa was in it. "Mr. Castonel is liked here."

"Liked in other folks' absence," grouned old Flockaway, who was a martyr to gont. "He has had nobody to oppose him, so has had full swing. But just let Ailsa come, and you'll see. All Ebury will tell you that Castonel is not fit to tie his shoe-strings."

"I suppose there is room for both of them."

"There'll be more room for one than the other," persisted the martyr. "If a royal duke came and set up doctoring here he'd get no custom against Ailsa."

The news proved true; and Mr. Ailsa and his family arrived at his house, which had been let during his absence. An unassuming, gentlemanlike man, with a placid countenance. "Little Tuck," his usual appellation, an undersized little fellow with a squeaking voice, who had once been an apprentice under Mr. Ailsa, was the first to run in to see him.

"We are all so glad to see you back, sir," he said, insensibly falling into his old, respectful mode of speech. "Mrs. Ailsa is looking well too."

"I am well," she answered. "No more need of foreign climates for me. But you must have plenty of news to tell us about Ebury."

"Oh, law!" echoed little Tuck. "I shan't know where to begin. First of all, I am living here. Second assistant to Mr. Castonel."

"You had set up for yourself in Brenton when I left," observed the surgeon.

"Yes, but it didn't answer," replied Mr. Tuck, with a doleful look. "I'm afraid I kept too many horses. So I aght the shortest way would be to cut it, before any sh came; and I sold off and came over here, and hired elf out to Mr. Castonel."

He has played a conspicuous part in Ebury, has he not, Mr. Castonel ?"

Yes, he has. He came dashing down here from London, ha cab and a tiger and two splendid horses; and got all practice away from poor old Winnington, and married miece against his will. When Mr. Winnington died, folks dit was of a broken heart."

"And then she died, did she not?" said Mrs. Ailsa.

"She did. Mr. Castonel's next move was to run away th Ellen Leicester. And she died."

"What did they die of?" asked the doctor.

"I can't tell you," replied Mr. Tuck. "I asked Rice one y, and he said he never knew; he could not make it out. hey had both been ill but were recovering, and went off addenly in convulsions. And now he has married Frances havasse."

"I should have felt afraid to risk him," laughed Mrs.

150. "Oh, was she, though!" responded the little man. "She d her mother were all cock-a-hoop over it, and have looked wn on Ehury ever since. They'll hardly speak to me in street. Frances served out poor Hurst, I'm afraid. low he was wild after her."

"Who is Hurst ?"

"The curate. Poor Mr. Leicester is no longer able to ke duty. Ellen's running away with Mr. Castonel nearly id him up, and her death finished it. I fear he is on his at lugs."

Do you like "What sort of a man is this Mr. Castonel? m ? "

&quot;I don't. I don't understand him."

"Not understand him?"

"I don't," repeated Mr. Tuck, with a very decided shake of the head. "I don't understand him. He has a look of the eye that's queer. I wish you would take me on as assistant, Mr. Ailsa. I'd come to you for the half he gives me. You'll get plenty of practice back. People will be glad to return to you; for, somehow, Mr. Castonel has gone down in favour. They talk more about that strange woman."

Mr. Ailsa looked up. "What are you speaking of?"

"Well, when Mr. Castonel first came down here shafollowed him, and brought a maid with her, and she has lived ever since in Beech Lodge, Squire Hardwick's game-keeper's, formerly."

"Who is she?"

"There's the puzzle. She is young, and very handsome, and quite a lady. Mr. Castonel gives out that it's a relation. He goes to see her, but nobody else does."

"Curious!" remarked Mr. Ailsa.

"By the way, you remember Mary Shipley, ma'am ?"

"Yes, indeed," returned Mrs. Ailsa. "Mary was a good girl. I would have taken her abroad with me, if she could have left her father."

"Incky for her if you had, ma'am," was the blunt rejoinder of Mr. Tuck, "for she has gone all wrong."

"Gone wrong ! Mary?"

"And Mr. Castonel gets the blame. But he is a sly fellow, and some people think him a lamb. Mary tells nothing, but she appears to be sinking into a decline."

"I am grieved to hear this," returned Mrs. Ailsa. "Her mother was nurse at the Hall when we were children, and she named Mary after me."

"It appears to me," observed Mr. Ailsa, arousing himself from a reverie, "that your friend Mr. Castonel has not brought happiness to Elury, take it all in all."

He has brought plenty of unhappiness and plenty of th," replied Mr. Tuck. "I don't say it is his fault," ed the little man, "but it's certainly his misfortune."

What a row there is over this Ailsa!" exclaimed Mr. tonel as he sat down that same night with his wife. took looked in just now, dancing mad with excitement, ause 'Mr. Ailsa was come, and he had been in to see a.' Who is Ailsa, pray?"

"You know, Gervase; you have often heard of him ely," replied Mrs. Castonel, answering the letter rather in the spirit of the words. "Every one is saying he will ke your practice from you; even mamma thinks he will see a formidable rival."

"What is there in him to be formidable?" slightingly arned Mr. Castonel. "Fil sew him up, Frances, as I did I Winnington."

"If you mean to imply rain by 'sewing-up,' I think not," aghed Mrs. Castonel. "He has a large fortune, and his ife is connected with half the great people of the county. Exwas Miss Hardwick, of the Hall, and the nicest girl in a world."

The popular opinion as to Mr. Ailsa's success was not toundless: for of eighteen patients who fell ill in the ext three weeks, counting rich and poor, seventeen of them ent to Mr. Ailsa, though he never solicited a single case.

How the world would get on without gossip few people in tell. One day Mrs. Major Aere, who was by no means a taciture or a cautious woman, paid a visit to Mrs. Castonel. "Now, my dear," she said to Frances, "I should accommend Mr. Castonel to call Ailsa out."

Frances glanced at her with an amused look. "Oh, the patients will come back to my husband. They will not all remain with James Ailea"

- "I don't mean that," returned Mrs. Major Acre. "Some stupid people have gone over to him, but you can't call a man out for the caprices of others. No, my dear. But James Ailsa has made very free remarks upon your husband."
  - " Indeed!"
- "It seems Mrs. Ailsa has wormed out of Mary Shipley who it was that led her into mischief—you know the Hardwicks always took an interest in those Shipleys—and Mary has confessed to Mrs. Ailsa what she never would to any one else."
  - "And who was it?" asked Frances.
  - "Mr. Castonel."

A vivid fire rushed into the cheeks of Frances.

- "And I hear Ailsa declares that, had he been in Ebury at the time, he should have taken upon himself to bring Mr. Castonel before the justices for it. They have forbidden her to let him go there any more."
  - "He does not go there," cried Frances, vehemently.
- "I wouldn't take an oath one way or the other, but if he does, child, he wouldn't be likely to tell you," observed the senseless old lady. "There's no answering for men. My dead husband had a saying of his own, that he was fond of treating his brother officers to, 'Do anything you like, boys, but never let the women know it.' Meaning us wives, my dear."

Frances sat as one stepefied.

- "And now I am going on to your mamma's, and-"
- "Oh, pray do not say anything of this to mamma," interrupted Frances, rising in excitement. "She would write word to papa, and————Pray do not, Mrs. Acre!"
- "As you please, child. If I don't, other people will. It's known all over Ebury."

When Mr. Castonel entered, Frances met him with assion. "You have deceived me throughout!" she cried—rou have deceived papa! And rather than be a dupe, I muld leave you and go home to live again. Papa would at let me remain here. I know his sentiments. He spoke the about this very subject, and begged me not to marry mutil it was cleared up. I will not remain here."

Mr. Castonel looked, as the saying is, taken by storm. What on earth is the matter, Frances? I am guilty of adeceit."

"Equivocation will only make matters worse. Oh, I shall p mad! I shall go mad! To think that people should be ble to say the same of me that they did of Caroline Hal and Ellen Leicester!"

Mr. Castonel's countenance flushed red, and then became badly pale. He faltered forth, rather than spoke—"And dat did they say of Caroline and Ellen?"

"That you neglected them for others."

"Oh!" The perfectly negligent tone of the ejaculation, and the relieved and half-mocking face, did not tend to alm the anger of Mrs. Castonel.

"I know the truth now about Mary Shipley. It has been liselosed to me to-day. Papa questioned you on that report himself, and you denied that there was any truth in it."

"There was no truth in it," was the calm reply of Mr. Castonel. "Why did you not tell me what you meant before exciting yourself thus, Frances? I could have reassured you."

We will have Mr. Castonel to his reassuring, merely observing that he did succeed in his task; and so fully, that his wife was ready to go down on her knees for having doubted him. Verily he possessed some subtle power, did Mr. Castonel.

June came in, and strange, strange to say, news went out to Ebury of the illness of Mrs. Custonel. Strange, because her symptoms were the same as those which had attacked Mr. Castonel's first and second wives, destroying prospects of an heir.

Mrs. Chavasse arrived in hot haste. Frances laughed at her perturbation. "You have sent for Mr. Ailsa, of course," said Mrs. Chavasse.

- "Mr. Ailsa shall attend no wife of mine," was the determined rejoinder of the surgeon. "I'll see him in his coffin first."
- "Listen, Mr. Castonel. You have lost two wives; it may have been through negligenes in not having good advice; I know not. You shall not lose my daughter if I can prevent it. Not an hour shall go over without further advice."
- "Call in any medical man you please, except Ailsa," said Mr. Castonel. "I should wish it done."
- "You have taken a prejudice against him," retorted Mrs. Chavasse. "None are so desirable, because he is on the spot."
- "Ailsa shall never darken my doors. I will send an express to the county town for one or other of the physicians. Which will you have?"
- "Dr. Wilson," answered Mrs. Chavasse. "And meanwhile let Mr. Rice come in."

So it was done. Mr. Rice paid a visit to Mrs. Castonel, and declared she was in no danger whatever.

- "I hope not," said Mrs. Chavasse. "I think not. But past events are enough to terrify me."
  - "True," assented Mr. Rice,
- Dr. Wilson came in the course of the day. "No danger," he said; just as Mr. Rice had done.

The following day, however, Mrs. Castonel was worse; and the day after that her life was despaired of. Her own state of excitement contributed to the danger. She woke up that morning from a doze, and whether she had dreamt thing to terrify her was uncertain, but she started up in ther eyes glaring wildly. Mr. Castonel was then alone h lar.

*Oh, Gervase, I am in danger! I know I am in danger!" "My dear, no." For of course it was his duty to soothe r. "Ca'm yourself, Frances."

"Oh!" she cried, clasping him in deep distress, "can I be ing to die? Must I indeed follow Ellen Leicester? I to have thought nothing of death-who deemed it so far

"Be quiet, Frances; I insist upon it," he angrily exaimed. "You will do yourself incalculable mischief."

"What will my doom be? Gervase, do you remember my peaus? What have I done that I should be cut off in the adst of my happiness? But not without warning. That ream was my warning, and I neglected it!".

"Yet what had they done, Caroline and Ellen? Servase, save me! what will you do without me? me, save me! Let not this terrible fate be mine."

Mr. Castonel strove to hold her still, but she shook terribly; and as to stopping her words, he might as well have tried to stem a torrent in its course.

The grave! the grave! the grave for me! I who have lived but in pleasure!"

"My dear Frances, what are you raving about? If you ave lived in pleasure, it has been innocent pleasure."

"Oh yes, innocent in itself. If I had but thought of God with it, and striven to please Him; and I never did There lay the sin; not in the pleasure. Oh, save me Fetch Dr. Wilson. I must not die."

They calmed her after awhile, and for a day or two life hung upon a thread. Then she began to get sl better. But they were anxious faces still, those around bedside, her husband's, her mother's, good old Mrs. Muff's for they remembered it was when they were apparently re covering that the first and the second Mrs. Castonel had died. A few more days, and Frances sat up in her dressingroom, gay as ever. All danger was really over, and Mrs. Chavasse returned home.

"Gervase," she said, taking her husband's hand, "how foolish I was to frighten myself!"

"Ay, you were, Frances. But you would not listen to me then, when I told you so."

"I may go into the drawing-room to-morrow, and see visitors, may I not?"

"To be sure you may."

"Then ring the bell, please. I must send Hannah to order me a very pretty cap."

It was Mrs. Muff who answered it, not Hannah. Mr Castonel left the room as she came in.

"I am to go into the drawing-room to-morrow," said Mrs. Castonel. "Do you know it?"

"Yes, ma'am. I heard Mr. Rice say you might."

"And admit visitors."

"I did not hear him say that, but I should think there's no reason against it," replied the housekeeper.

"So I'll tell you what I want done," added Mrs. Castonel. 'Hannah must go to the milliners' and desire them to send ic some afternoon caps, to choose one from. If they have none ready they must make me one. Something simple and elegant. Shall I have it trimmed with white or pink?"

Mrs. Muff thought pink, as her mistress was just now so nale.

"Yes, pink; nothing suits my complexion so well as pink," cried Frances, all her old vanity in full force. "Send Hannah immediately. I am impatient to try it on."

The cap came, but not until night, and Frances had a glass ought to her, and sat figuring off before it, declaring she d never looked so well: if she were but a little older, she all take to caps for good. Mr. Castonel looked on, and aghed at her.

"It is getting time for you to be in bed, Frances," he id. "You must not presume too much upon your rewery."

"I am not tired in the least," she replied. "I will not a until I have had my supper. I never felt better."

"Do you know who they say is dying?" he resumed.

"No."

" Mr. Leicester."

"Mr. Leicester!"

"It is thought to be his last night. So, I hear, is the pinion of his friend and chum, Ailsa."

Mrs. Castonel did not like the tone. "Poor man! poor Mr. Leicester!" she sighed. "Well, they have had their hare of sorrow. How papa and mamma would have grieved for me: I have thought of it since my illness: and we are many of us, whilst Ellen was their only child. I wonder who will have the living? I hope it will be some nice saciable young person."

"I hope it will be anybody rather than Mr. Hurst," said e surgeon, spitcfully.

"What happy days we shall have together again, Ger ise!" she went on. "What should you have done if ad died!"

"The best I could," answered Mr. Castonel.

At that moment Mrs. Muff came in with a light supper or her mistress, and remained with her whilst she took it, Mr. Castonel descending to his laboratory. As she was arrying down the waiter again, a ring came to the doorarrying down bull, and John brushed past to answer it.

" Mr. Castonel at home?"

"Safe and sound," was the tiger's rejoinder, for the applicant was a page in buttons of his acquaintance.

"Then he must come as fast as he can pelt to missis. She's in a fit."

"You are wanted at Mrs. Major Acre's directly, sir," said John, hastily entering the laboratory. "She's took in a fit."

Mr. Castonel had taken out one of the little drawers—to John's amazement. For the lad had always believed that particular drawer to be a shain drawer. There appeared to be a paper or two in it, and a phial. The latter the surgeon held in his hand, and in reply to the message he muttered something, which, to John's ears, sounded very like strong language.

"I never knew, sir, as that drawer opened. I---"

"Begone!" thundered Mr. Castonel, turning on his servant a look so full of evil, that the young man bounded backwards some yards.

"Am I to go anywhere?" he stammered, not understanding.

"Go out and find Mr. Rice," raved his master. "Send him to Mrs. Acre's."

Searcely had John departed, when there came a second messenger for Mr. Castonel. "If he did not go at once, Mrs. Major Acre would be dead." Thus pressed, he took his hat and hurried out, after waiting a minute to put things straight in the laboratory. Mr. Rice, however, had arrived at Mrs. Major Acre's, and Mr. Castonel returned home.

On the following morning, Mrs. Leicester and Mr. Ailsa stood around the rector's dying bed. He lay partially insensible: had so lain ever since daylight. "Do you not think Dr. Wilson late?" whispered Mrs. Leicester. "It is half-past seven."

"I expected him before this," replied Mr. Ailsa. "But, lear Mrs. Leicester, he can do no good."

"I know it," she answered, through her tears.

At that moment there rang out the deep tones of the passing-bell, denoting that an immortal soul had been called away. One of the chamber windows was open, to admit sir, and the sound came booming in from the opposite shurch. It aroused the rector.

"Have my people mistaken the moment of my departure?" he murmured. "Or is that one of my fellow-ethren is called with me?"

Mrs. Leicester leaned over him, and gently spoke, her is having noted the strokes more accurately than that of its dying man. "It must be, I fear, for Mrs. Acre. It is or a woman."

"I fancy not for Mrs. Acre," observed Mr. Ailsa. "Mr lice left her, last night, out of danger."

It was striking out now, fast and loud. Mrs. Leicester soticed her husband's anxious eye. "Who goes with me?" he panted—"who goes with me?" and, just then, little Tuck stole into the room, with a whitened face.

"Who is the bell tolling for?" asked Mrs. Leicester.

"For Mrs. Castonel. She died in the night."

With a sharp cry, the rector struggled up in bed. What lear, what horror was it that distorted his countenance, as he grasped Mr. Ailsa's arm and strove to speak? They never knew, for he fell back speechless.

"Oh, where can Dr. Wilson be?" sobbed Mrs. Leicester.
"Why is he not here?"

"He will not be long," whispered Mr. Tuck. "He was met outside the village, and taken to Mrs. Chavasse. The shock has brought on an attack of paralysis. Poor Castonel, Rice says, is in a lamentable state."

- "What did she die of?" marvelled Mr. Ailsa.
- "What did the others die of?" retorted Mr. Tuck. "Convulsions of some sort. Nobody knows. I never heard of such an unlucky man."

He was interrupted by a movement from Mrs. Leicester. The minister's spirit had passed away.

CHAPTER VIII.

DAME VAUGHAN'S WONDER.

Enury churchyard gaily and hotly. The two funerals had been arranged for the same day: but not intentionally. The bell had tolled from an early hour in the morning, out of respect to its regretted minister. Mr. Leicester's interment was fixed for ten o'clock, Mrs. Castonel's for eleven; consequently, no sooner had the clock struck nine, than tragglers began to move towards the churchyard, and soon they increased to groups, and soon to a crowd. All Ebury went there, and more than Ebury. They talked to one another (as though seeking an excuse) of paying the last tribute of respect to their many-years rector, but there was a more powerful inducement in their hearts—that of witnessing the funeral of Mr. Castonel's wife, and of staring at him.

All the well-dressed people, and all who possessed pews, entered the church, until it was crammed in every nook, scarcely leaving room for the coffins to pass up the aisle. The mob held possession of the churchyard, and there was not an inch of land, no, nor of a grave, on which people were not standing.

They saw it file out of the rectory and cross the read, a simple funeral, Mr. Hurst officiating. The coffin was borne by eight labourers, old parishioners, and the mourners followed with many friends, Squire Hardwick, of the Hall, and

Mr. Ailsa walking next the relatives. And so the body was consigned to the ground, and the traces of the first funeral passed away.

But what was that, compared with the show which followed? With its mutes, its feathers, its black chariots, its hearse, its mourning coaches, its velvet trappings, its pall-bearers, its trailing-scarfs and hatbands, its white hand-kerchiefs! The mutes alone, with their solemn faces and staffs of office, struck dumb the fry of infantry who had congregated amongst their elders.

- "Look at him! look at him!" whispered the mob as Mr. Castonel moved up the path by slow degrees after the body, beadle and sexton clearing the way with difficulty. "Don't he look white? The handkercher he's a covering his face with ain't whiter."
  - "Enough to make him. He---"
- "Hush-sh-sh! See who's a following of him! It's Mr. Chavasse. Sobbing like a child, for all he be such a great stout gentleman!"
- "But Mr. Chavasse were still in foreign parts, and knowed nothing o' the death !"
- "They sent him word, I heard. And he come over the sea in a carriage and six, to be in time for it, and got here at half-after nine this morning. How he's a crying!"
- "And his eldest son walking with him, and Master Arthur and the other behind, all crying too. Poor things!"
- "It seems but yesterday that Miss Chavasse come here in Lord Eastbury's carriage, like a queen. Who so proud as she, in her veils and her feathers?"
- "Queens die as well as other folks. It's said Mrs. Chavasse won't be long after her. She have had a shocking seizure."
- "Well, it's a fearsome thing for the poor young lady to have been cut off so sudden."

"It were as fearsome a thing for the other two. And sorse. For Miss Chavasse might have took warning by gem, and not have had him."

The made one of the spectators. "That I should like to dear up what it was as did cut 'em off."

Marmurs were arising amongst the crowd. "Ay, what as it? what took 'em?"

"What took that baby of Mary Shipley's, as was lying afe and well on my knee two minutes afore it went into he arrony?" persisted Dame Vaughan. "I have not long of that, if others has. The physic I give to it was supplied from Mr. Castonel's stock."

"I heard," broke in a young girl, "as this Mrs. Castonel died of convulsions."

"So they all did, so they all did. The wretch! the

"Come, come, you women," interrupted a man, "this ain't law nor gospel. Keep civil tongues in your heads."

But the cue had been given, the popular feeling arose, and hisses, groams, and ill words were poured upon Mr. Tastonel. He could not look whiter or more impenetrable than he had done before, but he doubtless wished the beadle put to the torture for not forcing a passage more quickly that he might get inside the church. As soon as that object was attained, the beadle rushed back amongst the crowd, and used his tongue and his stick vigorously, and what with that, and his formidable cocked-hat, he succeeded in enforcing silence.

So Frances, Mrs. Castonel, was laid in her grave, like unto the two fair flowers who had gone before her, and the procession returned, in its course, and disappeared. And the mob disappeared in its wake after winding up with three grouns for Mr. Castonel.

CHAPTER IX.

MR. TUCK'S FRIGHT.

THE churchyard was gradually emptying itself of a mass of human beings, for two funerals had taken place there; two bodies had been consigned to their parent earth till the grave should yield up its dead. One was that of the rector of the place, a man of years and sorrow; the other that of a young and lovely woman; and it was in the last that the attraction lay.

A gentleman who had attended the funeral of the rector made his way, as the mob dispersed, towards the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Chavasse, the parents of the ill-fated young lady just interred. It was Mr. Ailsa. He had been called in to Mrs. Chavasse; for the fearful shock of her daughter's death had brought on an attack of paralysis. The medical men had no fears for her life, but they knew she would remain a paralyzed cripple; that she had suddenly passed from a gay, middle-aged matron, to a miserable, decrepit old woman.

As Mr. Ailsa was passing down the stairs from her chamber, a door was pushed open, his hand was grasped, and he was pulled into the darkened parlour. It was by Mr. Chavasse, who tried to speak, but failed, and, sitting down, sobbed like a child. It was the first time they had met for years; for, since Ailsa's return, Mr. Chavasse had been away in Scotland, examining into some agricultural evements, with the Earl of Eastbury, to whom he was The news of his daughter's death had steward. ght him home.

Oh, Ailsa, my dear friend, could you not have saved 3 33

I was not her attendant," was Mr. Ailsa's reply. "Mr. and Dr. Wilson no doubt did all they could; not to k of her husband."

Is it true that she was recovering? I know nothing. dy reached here in time for the funeral, and my wife is in a state to give particulars, even if she knows them." I hear that she was getting well. She had been ill, as are probably aware, but had recovered so far as to be of danger."

Entirely so?"

'As Mr. Rice tells me."

'And then she was taken suddenly with convulsions." Mr. Ailsa nodded.

'And died. As the other wives had died."

Mr. Ailsa sat silent.

"Did you ever hear of three wives, the wives of one man, ving been thus attacked? Did you ever hear of so strange coincidence ?"

"Not to my recollection."

"And that when they were recovering, as they all were, at they should suddenly die of convulsions?"

Mr. Ailsa looked distressed.

"Do you know," added Mr. Chavasse, lowering his voice, the thought crossed my mind this morning to stop the meral. But somehow I shrank from the hubbub it would ave caused: and my grief had such full hold upon me. I and to my-clf, 'If I do cause an inquiry, it will not bring my child back to life."

"Very true," murmured Mr. Ailsa.

"Had I arrived yesterday, perhaps I should have entered upon it; I am sure I should, had I been here when she died. Speak your thoughts, Ailsa, between ourselves; see you no cause for suspicion?"

"I do not like to answer your question," replied Mr. Allea. "Castonel is no personal friend of mine; I have no ver specien to han; but we professional men are not fend of encouraging reflections upon each other."

"Have you heard of that business at Thomas Shipley's, about the child dying in the strange manner it did?"

"Mrs. Allsa has heard the particulars from Mary; and Datas Vanashan seize i upon me the other day, and spoke of them."

" Well, a stant that a suspicious thing?"

"I think it was a very extraordinary one. But the medi-

"The fact is this, Alisa. Each event, each death, taken by itself, would give the to no suspicion; but when you come to add them together, and look upon them collectively it is there the neigh is staggered. I wish," added Mr. Cashasa, mussingly, "I know the full particulars of my child's leach; the details, as they took place,"

" You surely can bearn them from Mr. Castonel."

"Would be tell them?"

"Yes If he he an innerent man,"

"If It you know," whispered Mr. Chavasse, "that they provided at an i lassed him in the charchyard to-day, and any him poisson r?"

1. Not 10

They dol. "What a fool I was," he continued, wringmag has hands, "ever to let her have Castonel! It was my water worried me into it. Allsa, I must get at the particulars of her death-bed. I shall not rest until I do. If Castonel will not furnish them, I'll ask them of Mrs. Muff." Mr. Chavasse remained irresolute all the day. At sunset stole through the twilight to the house of his son-in-law. t Mr. Castonel had also stolen out somewhere, under ver of the night. The faithful upper servant and houseeper of all the Mrs. Castonels came to him in the din-From, and the two sat down and sobbed together.

"What did she die of?" groaned Mr. Chavasse.

"Sir," said Mrs. Muff, "I know no more than you. hen she went to bed she was as well as I was, and ten mes merrier, talking about a new cap she had ordered, al the visitors she would see on the morrow. That was bout half-past nine, and by eleven we were all in bed in he house. In the middle of the night-if you killed me, leouldn't tell you the time, for in my flurry I never looked, at it may have been about two-their bedroom bell, the ne which is hung by John's door on the top landing, in ase Mr. Castonel is called out and wants him in the night, ng out such a dreadful peal, loud and long, as brought us out of our rooms; and master was shouting from his amber. The others stopped to put a few things on, but ran down in my night-clothes. Sir, in ten minutes Mrs. astonel was dead."

"How did she seem when you got to her? How did he look ?"

"She was writhing on the bed in awful agony, screamin and flinging her arms about. Mr. Castonel called it conmisions. I suppose it was. It was just as the other two or young ladies went off. He was in a terrible state, and brew himself on the body afterwards, and sobbed as if his eart would break."

"Did she take anything in the night?"

"Nothing, except some barley-water. She had drunk that, for the glass was empty."

"Mrs. Muff," he whispered, taking her hand with a beseeching look, "do you feel that there has always been fair play?"

"The merciful goodness knows, sir. I can't help asking myself all sorts of ugly questions, and then I am vexed at doing it. I know one thing; that it's an unlucky house, and as soon as to-morrow comes I take myself out of it. I could not stay. Mr. Castonel owes me three months wages, and if he says I have no right to them, for leaving without warning, why, he must keep them. Hannah, neither, won't stay. I had hard work to make her remain for the funeral."

"You saw them all after death. How did they look?"

"I saw them all, and noticed nothing extraordinary. But Mr. Castonel had the coffins serewed down quickly."

"Has anything ever happened to excite your suspicions?"

"I cannot say it has. Though one circumstance has been much in my mind the last few days. The evening of the death of the first Mrs. Castonel, I and Hannah were seated in the kitchen when we heard a noise in the laboratory. I went to see, and there was Mr. Castonel, who must have stolen downstairs and gone in without noise. He had let fall one of the little drawers, and I saw a phial and a paper or two on the floor. He was in a fierce rage with me for looking in. But the curious part is, that he had always passed off that drawer for a dummy drawer."

Mr. Chavasse did not speak. He listened eagerly.

"And on the night of your poor daughter's death, sir, he had got that same drawer out again. John went in, and saw him with it, and Mr. Castonel—to use the had's words—howled at him and chivied him back again. 'What an odd thing it is, Mrs. Muff,' said he to me, that same evening, 'that I should always have took that drawer for a sham!'"

Did you notice him at the drawer when his second wife d, poor Ellen Leicester?"

No. But he may have gone to it every day of his life hout my seeing him. The curious point is, that he all have been seen at it on these two particular nights, I by neither of us at any other time. Oh, sir, whether has been bad luck, or whether it has been anything rse, what a mercy if this man had never come near arry!"

"It would have been a mercy indeed," echoed poor Mr. avasse.

On the following afternoon John was in the laboratory, sen Mr. Rice and Mr. Tuck came in.

"Here's a pretty state of things," exclaimed the tiger. Mother Mull's gone off, and Hannah's gone off, leaving 2, and master, and Ralph in the house, to do the work fourselves."

"Gone off!" cchoed Mr. Rice. "What for?"

"You must ask 'em that," returned the tiger. "Hannah id the house smelt of poison."

"Psha!" exclaimed Mr. Rice. "Go with this mixture Mrs. Major Acre's."

"I tell you what," cried little Tuck, as John went out, Mr. Castonel will find it no pleasant matter. It must be dreadful cut up to the feelings to have an inquiry pendag whether you have not carried on a wholesale system of misoning."

"What do you mean?" cried Mr. Rice, staring at him.

"Chavasse is bent on an inquiry. He has taken some aspicion in his head, about foul play. So the body is to one up, and an inquest to be held."

"Mrs. Castonel's body?" cried Mr. Rice, quickly.
'Nonsense!"

- "Mrs. Castonel the third. And if they find anything queer, Mrs. Castonel the second and Mrs. Castonel the first will follow. While they are about it, too, they may disinter that child of Mary Shipley's."
- "Where did you hear all this?" demanded Mr. Rice, incredulously.
- "Oh, I heard it. Mr. Chavasse was wavering over it yesterday, but he has been at the Hall to-day, and laid his suspicions and information before Squire Hardwick. I say, you see this set of drawers?"
  - "Well?" resumed Mr. Rice, casting up his eyes.
- "There's something up, about that top one being a secret drawer and not a dummy; and they say it has got something inside it that won't do to be looked at."
- "I do not believe it is a drawer," observed Mr. Rico.
  "I never knew it was."
- "Nor I," rejoined little Tuck. "Hand me the steps, will you. I'll have a look."
- "Let the steps alone, and the drawer too," said Mr. Rice. "Whether it's wrong or right, we need not draw ourselves into the affair. Better keep out of it."
- "Well, perhaps you are right. What do you think Mr. Francis Hardwick said?"
  - "I had rather not hear. How was old Flockaway?"
- "My!" ejaculated little Tuck. "I never went. I forgot it."
- "Then I'll go now. I suppose this gossip put it out of your head."
- "It did. I say though, Rice, isn't it a horrid go for Castonel?"

It must have been a "horrid go" for Mr. Castonel to hear this; and hear it he did, for he was scated outside the open window. Had he placed himself there to listen? No one had ever known him to sit down on the bench before fr. Rice left the house, and Mr. Tuck cast his eyes on drawers. He was a good-natured, harmless little fellow, liked to include his curiosity. "Shall I look, or shall not?" soliloquized he. "There's an old proverb that s. Discretion is the better part of valour.' Oh, bother cretion! Here goes. There's nobedy at home to see me." He set the steps against the case of drawers, and mounted , his eager hand outstretched. But at that moment a ad and shoulders slowly rose before the window, and r. Tuck, in his fright, and the steps, nearly came down gether. For it was Mr. Castonel.

"Are you searching for anything?" equably demanded

"Nothing, sir," stammered Mr. Tuck, putting up the Ir. Castonel. teps very humbly.

"Come out here," said Mr. Castonel.

Mr. Tuck went out. Had he been detected poisoning Mr. Castonel, he could hardly have felt more ashamed, more anjustifiably prying. Mr. Castonel made room for him on the bench beside him.

"I thought you were out, sir," he awkwardly began.

"No," answered Mr. Castonel. "I sat down here an anr ago, and "-he coughed-"dropped asleep. Your coice, talking with Mr. Rice, awoke me."

"Oh, my heart!" grouned Mr. Tuck to himself, becoming very hot. " He must have heard all we said. Did you, sir ?" he asked aloud, following out his thoughts.

"Did I what?" demanded Mr. Castonel, turning upon him his sinister eye. He knew he had got him safe-that simple little Tuck was no match for him.

" Hear the -the-stuff-that I and Rice were saying?"

"I heard the stuff you were saying," curtly rejoined Mr. Custonel.

"Of course I ought not to have repeated it, sir; but will be all over the village to-morrow, without me. I am very sorry for it."

- "So am I," responded Mr. Castonel. "Sorry that people should be such fools."
  - "And I hope it will be cleared up," added Mr. Tuck.
- "You do not believe there is anything to clear up, do you?" almost savagely retorted Mr. Castonel.
  - "I meant the reports," deprecated little Tuck.
- "But I asked you if you believe there can be anything to clear up?" repeated Mr. Castonel.
- "No, sir, not now that I am talking with you. I don't know whether I believed it or not, up at the Hall. I was struck all in a maze there."
  - "What brought you at the Hall?"
  - "They sent for me."
  - "Who?"
- "Squire Hardwick. No; stop; I think it was Mr. Chavasse. Or the two together: I don't know."
  - "What for?"

Mr. Tuck hesitated.

- "I am a wrongfully accused man," burst forth Mr. Castonel. "Even you were ready enough, but now, to accuse me to Rice. Who is it that is asking for a coroner's inquest?"
  - "Mr. Chavasse."
  - "Upon what grounds? Speak up. Don't equivocate."
- "I am not equivocating, sir," cried little Tuck. "And as you heard what I said to Mr. Rice, you know the chief facts. But I don't like to repeat these things to your face."
- "I wish you to repeat them. I must know what they charge me with. An innocent man can listen to slander unmoved.
- "And you are innocent!" cried Mr. Tuck, brightening up.

- "Innocent! Innocent of the death of my dear wives! I would have died to save them."
- "Then I'll tell you all I did hear, sir," answered simple, credulous little Tuck. "Mr. Chavasse has got something in his head about Mrs.—your late wife."
  - " Got what? Speak out."
- "He says he wants to prove whether she came fairly by her death. Perhaps," added Mr. Tuck, in a conciliating tone, for he did shrink from his present task—"perhaps he fears something may have been given to her by mistake."
- "No innuendoes," was the rough answer. "I shan't wince. He fears I may have poisoned her, that's what it is."
  - "Well," warmly cried little Tuck, "I don't fear it now."
  - "Who went to Francis Hardwick's?"
- "Mr. Chavasse was there, and they had me up, and Mrs. Muff; and the Squire asked Mr. Ailsa to be present, that he might judge whether there were medical grounds to go upon. And Dame Vaughan came up——"
- "Why did not Francis Hardwick have the whole parish up?" angrily interrupted the surgeon.
- "Dame Vaughan was not sent for. She went of her own accord. Mr. Chavasse had met her in the morning, and asked her something, and she went up. It was about those powders that she complained, when Mary Shipley's child died. She had nothing to say about Mrs. Castonel. She yowed those powders were poison."
  - "Mr. Rice made them up and sent them, whatever they were."
  - "But Dame Vaughan said Mr. Castonel might have changed what Mr. Rice made up. She said, in fact, she'd almost be upon her oath he did, and that she had asked John, who said it was Mr. Castonel gave the powders into his hand, and that Mr. Rice was not present. Mr. Ailsa said he never heard a woman go on so, and the Squire threatened to turn her out of the justice-room unless she could be calm."

"Did you hear her?"

"Of course not. They had us in, one at a time, to the justice-room—as the poor call it. The Squire and Mr. Ailsa sat together at the table, and Mr. Chavasse sat on that low bench under the window, with his head bent on to his knees. Dame Vaughan has an awful tongue. She said she was an old fool; and, if she had not been one, the wickedness would have been brought to light at the time."

Mr. Castonel looked up sharply. "She is a fool. What did she mean?"

"Why, she said she gave the remaining four powders into your hands, after the baby died; and let you take them into the yard, by yourself, at Shipley's cottage, so that you had plenty of time to—to——."

"To what? Speak out, I say again."

"To walk off with the poison, and leave wholesome powders in its stead. She said, also "

"Go on," laughed Mr. Castonel, apparently quite at his case. Much more so than his assistant, who spoke with frequent hesitation.

"That you must have planted yourself purposely in the boy's way, who went after you, so as to run down to Thomas Shipley's and secure the poison, before Mr. Rice or anybody could come."

"She's a lady!" ironically uttered Mr. Castonel.

"She is that," responded little Tuck. "She protested she would dig the baby up with her own hands, without any spade, if the magistrates would but go into the matter. Squire Hardwick told her it was quite an after consideration whether they went into it at all, and that it had nothing to do with the subject under notice."

- "I'll 'dig' her!" uttered Mr. Castonel. "What did they ask Mrs. Muff?"
- "I don't know what they asked her, but I believe she was cautious, and couldn't or wouldn't say one way or the other whether she suspected or not. Oh-and who else do you think came to the Hall?"
  - "All Ebury, probably."
  - " Mrs. Leicester."
  - "Mrs. Leicester! Who next? What did she want?"
- "Mrs. Leicester, in her widow's weeds. She was in there, ever so long, with Mr. Chavasse, and the Squire, and Ailsa. Mr. Chavasse had been to the rectory and had an interview with her in the morning, and she came up. We gathered that she objected to Ellen-to Mrs. Cas-to the remains of her daughter being disturbed, and that Squi Hardwick promised that they should not be, unless the en of justice peremptorily demanded it."
  - "What questions did they ask you?"
  - "They asked me very few, because I had nothing tell," replied little Tuck. "When Mr. Chavasse fou that I had not interfered with his daughter's illness, fact had not seen her, he said he was sorry to have trouble me; that they ought to have had Mr. Rice up instead."
    - " Have they written to the coroner?"
  - "I don't know, I'm sure. Squire Hardwick said affair looked gravely suspicious, and that an inquest of indispensable. He said-shall I tell you what else he sa sir ?"
    - or Tell! Of course."
  - " His opinion was, that the fact of three young wive dying in so sudden and mysterious a manner afforded uncommon scope for doubt, even without the attendance of other suspicious circumstances."

&quot;What 'other ?""

- "That's more than I can say. Unless he meant what that beldame, Dame Vaughan, set affoat."
- "Tush!" scornfully retorted Mr. Castonel. And then he sat for some minutes in a reverie. Little Mr. Tuck rose.
- "Do you want me any longer, sir? I have not had my tea."
  - "No," said the surgeon. "Have you told all?"
  - " Every word, sir."
- "What were you saying to Mr. Rice about that case of drawers?" returned Mr. Castonel, half turning his head towards the spot where they stood.
- "Oh, I forgot that; I did indeed. Some of them say that topmost drawer is not a——"
  - "Don't speak so vaguely. Who?"
- "I'm blest if I know who," said Mr. Tuck, after considering. "They asked me, and I said I always took that topmost drawer to be a dummy, but they say it is not; that there's something inside it, and that you had it out the evenings that your wives died. Of course they meant to insinuate that—that—"
- "That I keep a subtle poison in it," sneered Mr. Castonel, "and have been dealing it out in doses. Any more?"
  - "That is all, sir."
- "Good. You need not say, outside, that you have told me this. I am glad I know who my enemies are."
- "I will not say a word to any one, sir," carnestly replied be little man. "You may rely upon me. Good evening." Mr. Tuck departed. Mr. Castonel remained on the bench.
- the former hastened up the street, thinking what an spersed man the surgeon was, he encountered Mr. Ailsa.
- "Now I'll just ask the question," thought he. "I'm sure if I can let Castonel know anything certain, it is what I ought to do, with so many against him. I say, sir," quoth he aloud, "have they written to the coroner yet?"

- "Not yet. Mr. Francis Hardwick wished to confer with a brother magistrate first. Mr. Chavasse did not consult He---" him in his magisterial capacity, but as a friend.
  - "Are you sure?" interrupted Mr. Tuck.
- "Quite sure. If any magistrate has to interfere, it will not be my brother-in-law: he is acting solely as Mr. Chavasse's private friend."
- " Perhaps it is not decided that there will be any inquest," said Mr. Tuck, briskly.
- "Oh yes, that is decided; Mr. Chavasse demands it. The coroner will be written to to-morrow."
- "Do you know, Mr. Ailsa, I do believe Castonel is as innocent as you or I."
- "I hope he is. It will be a most horrible blow to all parties interested, should the contrary be proved."
- " He says he would have died to save his wives. must be innocent."
- "I heartily wish he may be. Good evening. I am on my way to see Mrs. Chavasse."
  - " Will she get better?"
  - "Better. But never well."

James Ailsa continued his way, and Mr. Tuck continued But suddenly he stopped and ruminated.

"Suppose I go back, and tell Castonel at once! That would be one grain of comfort. I know I should want a good many grains if I were in his shoes."

So he turned back to the house of Mr. Castonel. instead of ringing at the front door, and bringing Mr. Castonel to open it, he walked round to the side of the house and tried the back garden door, which, as he knew, was occasionally left unlocked, though against orders. It was open, and Mr. Tuck went in. Mr. Castonel was not on the bench then, and Mr. Tuck entered the house by the little door next the surgery.

The first object he saw was Mr. Castonel, mounted on the very steps, as he had been, and in the very same place. And he held the "dummy" drawer in one hand, and grasped some papers and a phial with the other.

"Hallo!" cried Mr. Castonel, dashing the papers and phial into it, and the drawer back into its place, as he rapidly descended, "how did you get in? I heard you go away."

"I came in by the garden door."

"Who has done that? Who has dared to leave it unfastened?" rayed Mr. Castonel, with his awful glare.

That glare had never yet been turned upon Mr. Tuck. He did not like it, and he confessed afterwards that he felt as if he would prefer to be safe outside the house, rather than alone in it with Mr. Castonel. He had the presence of mind (he called it so) to speak in a careless tone.

"One of the servants, no doubt. Very stupid of them, for boys may get in and steal the gooseberries, little odds to them whether they are green or ripe. I came back to tell you, sir, that they have not written to the coroner. I met Mr. Ailsa as I left here, and put the question to him point-blank, and he said they had not; so I thought you might like to know it. He told me something else too, that Mr. Chavasse did not formally lay a charge before Mr. Francis Hardwick, he only consulted him as a friend."

"Oh!" cried Mr. Castonel.

"Mr. Ailsa supposes they will write to the coroner tomorrow," added Mr. Tuck. "But to-day is one day, and to-morrow is another; and before to-morrow comes they may change their mind, sir, and let the matter drop."

"They may write if they choose," said Mr. Castonel; "I want no favour from them. I have been forcing that drawer out, Tuck," he continued with a cough, "and find there's a paper of magnesia in it, and some hartshorn in a hial. They must have been there for ages. Ever since he drawers were appropriated when I first came into the louse."

"Then you never did have it out, as they say?" eagerly gird Mr. Tuck.

"Not that I have any recollection of. I suppose its not being used must have caused the impression to get abroad that it was a dummy drawer. Had any curious person applied to me upon the point, I could have told them it was not a dummy."

"It looks like a dummy," rejoined Mr. Tuck. "It has no knob and no lock to it, like the others. Why has it not?"

"How should I know why?" retorted Mr. Castonel.
"I did not make the drawers."

"Well, sir, good evening once more," concluded little Tuck. "I thought you might like to hear that there's nothing yet but smoke in the matter."

CHAPTER X.

BEECH LODGE.

A SMALL, but pretty cottage, built in the form of a lodge and so called, stood alone amidst trees, which nearly surrounded it, a whole grove of them, thick and lofty. Had the trees possessed human ears, they might have detected sounds, late that night, inside the cottage: unusuar sounds of dispute, and then commotion, and then distress; and afterwards the outer door was flung open, and a woman-servant sprang out of it with a smothered shrick, took her way at utmost speed towards the village, and rang a loud peal at the lodgings of Mr. Rice. That gentleman was just on the point of stepping into bed. He turned to the window, opened it, and looked out in his night-shirt.

- "It's here, isn't it, that Mr. Castonel's partner lives?" a woman breathlessly uttered.
  - "That's near enough. Yes. What's wanted?"
- "Oh —I did not know you in the flurry, sir. Piease to come this instant to Mr. Castonel. There's not a moment to lose."
  - "To Mr. Castonel! Where?"
  - "He is down at Beech Lodge. Make haste, sir, or he nay be dead before you come."
- "He dead! Mr. Castonel! What in the world is the matter with him?"
  - "Poison, I believe. Please to bring your remedies for it."
- "Here"—for she was striding away—" what description of poison?"

-were standing outside the Lodge, looking out for Mr. Rice, when the surgeons approached.

alı

"You are too late."

They did not know which spoke, they pressed on indoors. Mr. Rice half turned his head at a noise behind him. was the tiger, galloping down. In the small sitting-room, stretched on the floor, between the table and the fireplace, was Mr. Castonel. Dead.

The servant followed them into the room. Not so her mistress.

"Too true!" uttered Mr. Rice; "he has committed "s suicide. What's this?"

He was looking on the table. A decanter of wine and two glasses were there. One of the glasses was full, the other had been emptied. The woman was sobbing violently, and seemed to have lost all idea of caution or self-control.

"I can't say I ever like I him," she said, "but it is? horrible to see a man well one minute, and the next die before our eyes."

"What has led to this?" inquired Mr. Rice.

"He came here about eight o'clock, and had a violent quarrel with my mistress. I heard bits of it, here and there."

"Well?"

"It grew very bitter, and my mistress at length flew into a state of frenzy, and came to the door and called me in. That I might be a witness to her words, she said. I had never seen her in such a state before, nor anybody else, and she knelt down and swore a sol-mn oath that things should go on, in the way they had been going on, no longer, and that she would declare the truth to the world, and force him to acknowledge it, be the consequences what they might. That calmed Mr. Castonel; though, for the matter of that, he had not been so violent, but I think his cold sneers provoked her. He looked at her with a curious expression, and sat down on the sofa and seemed to be thinking. Then he told me to get the wine and some wine-glasses, and——"

"What are you saying?" interrupted a calm voice, and the mistress of the Lodge appeared. "Any information necessary for these gentlemen I can give myself."

The servant shrank from the room and began talking to John in the kitchen. The lady confronted the surgeons, keeping the table between herself and the body.

"Can you do nothing for him?"

"Nothing, I grieve to say," replied Mr. Ailsa, speaking with involuntary respect, in spite of his prejudices. Whatver may have been that lady's history, she had the bearing and manners of a refined gentlewoman."

"He must have been dead a quarter of an hour," added Mr. Rice. "Did he wilfully poison himself?"

"No," was the hely's calm answer.

Mr. Rice paused, probably in surprise. "Then could it have been taken in mistake?"

" Neither that. I gave it him."

They both stood staring at her. Was she to be believed? so quiet, so collected, so lovely-looking! How were they to act? An indistinct idea of having her secured ran through Mr. Rice's mind. But he did not know how to set about it, or whether he would be justified in doing so.

"I will give you an outline of the circumstances," she

"Madam," interrupted James Ailsa, "it—I beg your pardon but it may be my duty to caution you not to incriminate yourself."

A proud smile of self-possession, one full of meaning, arose to her lips. "I wish to tell you," she answered.

" May it not be well to reserve it for the coroner's inquest?"

"No. I should be an ineligible witness for him, in any court of law."

"Why ineligible for him?" involuntarily inquired  $M_r$ . Rice.

"Either for or against him. My testimony would not be taken."

Her words to them were as riddles: and they waited in silence.

"He came down here to-night, and we quarrelled. No matter what the quarrel was about: it was such as we had never had before. He calmed down: apparently. I knew that the more smiling he was without, the more tempestrous he was within. I stood here. Here," she added, advancing to the mantelpiece, but still not looking at what lay beneath her, and placing her elbow on the shelf and her hand before her eyes, "I stood in this way. He was pouring out some wine he had asked for, and I watched his movements in the glass, through my fingers. I did not intentionally watch him: my thoughts were far away, and I suspected nothing. Suddenly I saw him slip something from a paper into one of the glasses; I felt sure I saw him; but I had my senses about me, and I took no notice whatever, only drew away and sat down in this chair. He handed me the glass, the glass, mind, saying the wisest plan would be to forget our dispute for to-night, for he must be going, and we could discuss the matter at issue another time. I took the glass from him, raised it to my lips, as if to drink, and then, as though by a sudden impulse, put it on the table without tasting it. 'If I am to drink this wine,' I said, 'I must cat a biscuit first. Reach them.""

The lady pursed for a moment, and her hearers waited with breathless interest.

"He knew where they were kept—in that closet," she added, pointing with her finger to a closet opposite the fireplace, and the two medical men glanced at it. "He opened the door and stepped inside, it is rather deep, and me forth with the biscuits. But in that moment I had ranged the glasses. I took a biscuit, began slowly to eat , and he drank up his wine. In a few minutes he shrieked at convulsively. I sent for aid, ran out, and hid myself midst the trees, for I was afraid of him. When my servant ame back, we went in together, but I think the poison had hen done its work. It must have been subtle and deadly."

Mr. Ailsa took up the empty glass, and with Mr. Rice xamined the few drops left at the bottom. Not at first lid they detect the nature of the poison; it was indeed are and subtle, leaving, where it should be imbibed, but ittle trace after death.

" She says master's dead," sobbed John, as the gentlemen went out. "It can't be true."

"Too true, John," answered Mr. Rice.

"Sir, did he poison hisself, as she says? Did he do it on purpose?"

"No. He drank a glass of wine, and there was poison in it. He did not know it."

"Oh, my poor master!"

Full of excitement as Ebury had been—and had reason to be on several previous occasions, it was nothing compared with what rose with the following morning. Castonel dead! Mr. Castonel poisoned! John ostentatiously closed all the windows of the house, and sat himself outside on the door-step, forgetting dignity in grief, to answer the mass of inquirers. It was Mr. Ailsa who carried the news to Mr. Chavasse.

" Is not this a confirmation of our fears?" exclaimed the latter.

" I fear it looks very like it."

"Oh, it is horrible!" groaned Mr. Chavasse. "Thre young and happy girls to have been foully-"

"Nothing 15 .. Nav nav." interrupted James Ailsa.

"And never will be now," replied poor Mr. Chavasse.
"It is a mercy for the restor that he went beforehand."

Before the day was over, fresh news had gone to Ebury—that Mr. Chavasse meant not to pursue the investigation he had contemplated. Where was the use? he argued, since the guilty man—if he were guilty—was gone. Where indeed? echoed a few judicious friends. But Ebury in general considered itself very shabbily used, and has hardly got over the disappointment to this day.

An inquest, however, there was to be, over Mr., if not Mrs., Castonel, and Ebury's curiosity concentrated itself upon that event. Some gossip, told by the parish beadle, fanned the flame. When he had gone down to serve the two summonses at the Lodge, and required the name of the lady, she had replied "Castonel."

"Then it is a relative of his, after all!" quoth the village.

"And we have been judging so harshly of her and of him!"

"I think I shall call and leave a card, when it's all over, and I am about again," said Mrs. Major Acre. "That is, if she stops here."

The "dummy drawer" was examined previously to the inquest, and found to contain exactly what Mr. Castonel had said, a phial of hartshorn, and some magnesia. "Which of course he was putting there," was Dame Vanghan's comment, "when little Tuck caught him on the steps." The drawer had evidently possessed a secret spring, which had been recently wrenched away and was gone.

The day appoint d for the impost dawned, and those who ere connected with it, and those who were not, flocked up the Hardwick Arms. The strange lady was called in her turn, and the coroner demanded her name.

"Layinia Castonel.—I presume my evidence will be dispensed with, when I state who I am. A wife cannot give evidence in matters that touch upon her husband."

their verdict was to the effect that Gervase Castonel had met his death at her hands, but that she was justified in what she had done, having acted in self-defence.

So that was the ending of Mr. Castonel and his doings in Ebury: and a very unsatisfactory ending it was, in every sense of the word. The lady and the maid left the place the day subsequent to the inquest, and that was the ending of them. Numerous tales and rumours went abroad, as rumours always do. One said the money to establish Mr. Castonel had been hers, not his, and that she dared not publicly avow herself to be a wife, or it would be lost to Another that he had forced her to submit to his apparent marriages under threats, for that he held some dreadful secret of hers in his power, and she feared to gainsay him. Another --- But why pursue these reports? No one could tell whence they originated, or whether they were true or false. The whole affair remains a miserable mystery to Ebury, and probably ever will do so, and its exasperated curiosity has never been able to ascertain whether the three ill-fated young ladies did, or did not, die an unuatural death.

Mr. Castonel was buried in the churchyard by their side, and it took the beadle and four subordinates an hour and a half to clear it of the mob afterwards. And Mr. Ailsa quietly dropped into his old practice, and took on Mr. Rice and Mr. Tuck and John, for he found there would be work for all. And to the latter's extreme discomposure, he found Ars. Muff was to be taken on too, and would rule him as of old. And since Ebury subsided into tranquillity, it has become a matter of "good taste" there never to breathe the name of Gervase Castonel.

"I care not how often murders and other mysteries form the foundation of se if they give us such novels as these."-HARRIET MARTINEAU.

"Mrs. Henry Wood has an art of novel-writing which no rival possesses he same degree." - Spectator.

"The fame of M s. Henry Wood widens and strengthens."-Morning

IRS. HENRY WOOD'S NOVELS.

Sale nearly Five Million Copies.

I. EAST LYNNE.

NINE HUNDRED AND FORTIETH THOUSAND.

O'East Lyone' is to full of incident, so exciting in every page, and so admirably written, one har fly knows how to go to bed without reading to the very last page."-The

A work of remarkable power which displays a force of description and a dramatic comcenture we have seldom seen surpassed. The interest of the narrative intensifies itself to redepen pathos. The closing scene is in the highest degree tragic, and the whole manageare it to story exhibits unquestionable genius and originality."—The Datty News.
Feat Lynne' has been translated into the Hindustani and Parsee languages, and the cera of it has been very great."—Danner. Bandmann's Journal.
I was having a delightful conversation with a clever Indian officer, and listening to his ambenuar it being sent out to serve in China with Gordon. He gave me an account of the first to keep the regimental library together under difficulties, and how 'East to them from England. Gordon got hold of it, and was fascinated. He are 'was sent to them hom England. Gordon got hold of it, and was fascinated. He def to come riching from a distance, at some risk, to get hold of the volumes as they were to list the Vergal of FROM a LETTER. That " bethat From a Latter.

2. THE CHANNINGS.

THREE HUNDRED AND TWENTIETH THOUSAND.

#1The Channing of will probably be read over and over again, and it can never be read too en " A cumum M.

MRS. HALLIBURTON'S TROUBLES.

TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

The boldgress, originality, and social scrutiny displayed in this work remind the reade to Hesler. It would be difficult to place beside the death of Edgar Halliburton anyth the product of warmer to prace beside the death of Edgar Halliburton anylong of the construction of the problem of pathos and simplicity. It is long since the norm of the product of the problem of the problem of the property of the product of the property of the property of the problem. The Montener Pour.

THE SHADOW OF ASHLYDYAT.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTIETH THOUSAND.

"The shades of Ashlydyat' is very clever, and keeps up the constant interest of for it has a sight supernatural tinge, which gives the romantic touch to the sto a least small an affent used with even greater effect; but it is not explained aw the rod as in Walter Short's supernatural touches generally, and inartistically, were,

The genus of Mrs. Heavy Wood shines as brightly as ever. There is a scene or to the genus of Maria Goddiphin and her little girl just before she dies, which absolutely melt were. Maria Goddiphin and her little girl just before she dies, which absolutely melt be death agent likewise is exquisitely pathetic."—The Court Journal.

LORD OAKBURN'S DAUGHTERS 5.

TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH THOUSAND.

"The story is admirably told."-THE SPECTATOR.

2

6. VERNER'S PRIDE.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

" Verner's Pride ' is a first-rate novel in its breadth of outline and buildiancy of description Its exciting events, its spirited scenes, and its vivid details, all contribute to its triumph The interest this work awakens, and the admiration it excites in the minds of its readers must infallibly tend to the renown of the writer, while they herald the welcome reception o the work wherever skill in construction of no ordinary kind, or a ready appreciation of character, which few possess, can arouse attention or win regard. "-Tim Sen.

7. ROLAND YORKE.

TWO HUNDREDTH THOUSAND.

"In all respects worthy of the hand that wrote 'The Channings' and 'East Lynne, There is no lack of excitement to wile the reader on, and from the first to the last a well planned story is sustained with admitable spirit and in a masterly style."—The Dana News.

8. JOHNNY LUDLOW. First Series.

SIXTY-FIRST THOUSAND

"We regard these stories as almost perfect of their kind." - Seta TATOR.

" Fresh, lively, vigorous, and full of elever dialogue, they will meet with a ready welcome. The Author is masterly in the skill with which she manages her successive dramas," STANDARD.

"It is an agreeable change to come upon a book like ' Johnny Ludlow,' "-SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Vigour of description and a strong grasp of character," -- Atries of M.

"The Author has given proof of a rarer dramatic instinct than we had suspected among our living writers of fiction."—Noncomponents:, "Tales full of interest."—Vantry Fair.

"Fresh clear, simple, atrong in purpose and in execution, these stories have won admira-tion as true works of inventive art. Without a single exception they maintain a powerful hold of the mind of the reader, and keep his sympathics in a continued state of healthy excitement."-DAH.y THIRGRAPH.

o. MILDRED ARKELL

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

Mrs. Henry Wood certainly possesses in a wholly exceptional degree the power of ing the most startling incidents of supernatural influence with a certain probability and radies, which compels the most critical and sceptical reader, having once beginn to go on ing. . . . He finds himself conciliated by some hit of quiet picture, some accord of portio tenderness, some sweet domestic touch telling of a heart exercised in the rater experiences; and as he proceeds he wonders more and more at the manner in which the mystery, the criminality, the plotting, and the murdering reconciles itself with a quiet case of the justice of things; and a great moral lesson is, after all, found to be in the heart of all the turmoil and exciting scene shifting. It is this which has sarned for Mrs. Wood so high a place among popular novelists, and secured her admittance to homes from which the sensa-tional novelists so called are excluded."—THE NORCORFORMS I.

10. SAINT MARTIN'S EVE.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

" A good movel." - THE SPECTATOR.

"A group design that spared no pains to accumulate the materials for a curiously thrilling ory. THE SALE BLAY REVIEW.

IL TREVLYN HOLD.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTIETH THOUSAND.

"We cannot read a page of this work without discovering a graphic force of delineation to hit would not be cary to surpass."-THE DAILY NEWS.

12. GEORGE CANTERBURY'S WILL.

ONE HUNDREDTH THOUSAND.

of the mane of Mrs. Henry Wood has been familiar to novel readers for many years, and has fame actions and strengthens with the increase in the number of her books."—That Marking Post.

13. THE RED COURT FARM.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

or When we say that a plot displays Mrs. Wood's well-known skill in construction, our branch will dotte understand that their attention will be enchained by it from the first page in the last the l

14. WITHIN THE MAZE.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

The decided movelty and ingenuity of the plot of 'Within the Maze' renders it, in the first that of Min. Henry Wood's best novels. It is excellently developed, and the creat hardly flags for a moment."—The Graphic.

15. ELSTER'S FOLLY.

ONE HUNDREDTH THOUSAND.

" Mrs. Word fulfile all the requisites of a good novelist; she interests people in her books, then them anatoms about the characters, and furnishes an intricate and carefully woven I'm Mozmine, Post.

LADY ADELAIDE. 16.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTIETH THOUSAND.

" The Mrs. Henry Wood's best novels."-THE STAR.

Mac. He ay Wand est fort cel bre en Augiererre, et ses romans—très moraux et très Me Affertie demented a nos lecteurs une idée très suffisante du talent si élevé de mistress le ve Wie de L'Exercection Pennique.

17. OSWALD CRAY.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTIETH THOUSAND.

"Mrs. Word has certainly an art of novel-writing which no rival possesses in the same degree and kind. It is not we fancy, a common experience for anyone to leave one of these next unfinished. "The Spectator.

18. IOHNNY LUDLOW. Second Series

FORTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

"The author has given proof of a rarer dramatic instinct than we had suspected among our living writers of fiction. It is not possible by means of extracts to convey any adequate sense of the humour, the pathos, the dramatic power and graphic description of this book." THE NONCONFORMIST.

"Mrs. Henry Wood has made a welcome addition to the list of the works of contemporary fiction."—Attiun.mom (second notice).

"These most exquisite studies."—Nonconvolument (second notice).

"These tales are delightful from their unaffected and sometimes pathetic simplicity."-

STANDARD (second notice).

"To write a short story really well is the most difficult part of the art of fiction; and folimny Ludlaw has succeeded in it in such a manner that his-or rather her-art looks Tonny Lindow has successful in the state of the fertility of invention on which it is founded, "—fronk.

"Freshness of tone, briskness of movement, vigour, reality, humour, pathos. It is safe to affirm that there is not a single story which will not be read with pleasure by both sexes, of all ages." -- LLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

10. ANNE HEREFORD.

SEVENTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

"Mrs. Wood's story, 'Anne Hereford,' is a favourable specimen of her manner: the Incidents are well planned, and the narrative is easy and vigorous." - I'me lines rearen LONDON NEWS.

20. DENE HOLLOW.

FIGHTY-THIRD THOUSAND.

"Novel-readers wishing to be entertained, and deeply interested in character and notilent, will find their currently wholesomely graffined by the graphic pages of 'Dene Hollow,' an excellent move, without the disablacks of wearisome lightestons and monoronous platitudes so common in the chapters of modern diction."—The Monoron Post,

21. EDINA.

SIXTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

"The whole situation of the book is clever, and the plot is well manage L"-Academic. Edina's character is beautifully drawn." - The Torresany Women.

22. A LIFE'S SECRET.

NYE HUNDRED AND EIGHTIETH THOUSAND.

or New that the rights of statistal and labour are being fully imprired into, Mrs. Wood's stork of 'A Life's Secret' is parts marris opportune and interesting. It is based upon a plut that awakens curiosity and keeps it slive the orghout. The hero and heroine are marked with awakens cumously and seeps of acts introduced. The cited and necoune are marked with individuality, the love passages are firely drawn, and the story developed with judgment."—
THE Civil Survivin GA/#11R.
"If Mrs. Wood's book does not tend to exadicate the cowardice, folly, and slavish submission to lary agitators among the working men, all we can say is that it ought to do so, for it is at once well written, effective, amitrothiol."—The fitters rearen Times.

23. COURT NETHERLEIGH.

FIFTY-EIGHTH THOUSAND.

We always open one of Mrs. Wood's novels with pleasure, because we are sure of being and and internated. '- I'm Titena.

Lineade: l'émotion que vous sentires peu à peu montes à sotre cœur est saine et fortifiante. es-le : c'est un livre honnête a-rti d'une plume honnête et vous pourres le laisser trainer la table."—La Suntat (l'aris).

[Continued on next page.

24. BESSY RANE.

SIXTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

"The power to draw minutely and carefully each character with characteristic indi-iduality in word and action is Mrs. Wood's especial gift. This endows her pages with a itality which carries the reader to the end, and leaves him with the feeling that the veil which in real life separates man from man has been raised, and that he has for once seen and which in real life separates man from man has been raised, and that he has for once seen and the service of the last of # 25. JOHNNY LUDLOW. Third Series.

TWENTY-THIRD THOUSAND.

"The peculiar and unfailing charm of Mrs. Wood's style has rarely been more apparent than in this succession of chronicles, partly of rustic life, some relating the fortunes of prisons in a logor class, but all remarkable for an easy simplicity of tone true to nature." MORNING POST.

26. THE MASTER OF GREYLANDS.

SEVENTIETH THOUSAND.

"A book by Mrs. Wood is sure to be a good one, and no one who opens. The Master of Greylands' in anticipation of an intellectual treat will be disappointed. The keen analysis of character, and the admirable management of the plot, alike attest the clever novelist. meter Birbb.

27. ORVILLE COLLEGE.

FIFTY-FIRST THOUSAND.

"Mrs. Wood's stories bear the impress of her versatile talent and well-known skill in mining to account the commonplaces of daily life as well as the popular superstitions of the multitude."—The Lithrary World.

28. POMEROY ABBEY.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-NINTH THOUSAND.

"All the Personage are very cleverly individualised, and the way in which the mystery is worked my meloding its one horribly tragic incident, is really beyond all praise."—The Markov Post.

29. THE STORY OF CHARLES STRANGE.

TWENTY-SEVENTH THOUSAND.

"The characters and situations of which the author made her books are indeed beyond To Coon, their interest has been proved by the experience of many generations."-PAL MALL GAZETTE.

30. ASHLEY.

EIGHTY-FOURTH THOUSAND.

firstion, being able to write a short tale well. They are full of dramatic incidents, especial the last stury, 'Mr. Castonel,' and are said to be founded on facts. 'Ashley' is mo interesting, "—CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

THE HOUSE OF HALLIWELL. 31.

MINETY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

"The House of Halliwell' is an early effort of the late Mrs. Henry Wood, written before feer great success, 'East Lynne,' saw the light some thirty years ago. The strength and dramatic power ever present in the later works of her practised hand are here seen in embryo; and those who delighted in 'The Red Court Farm' will renew with pleasure their acquaintance with the sprightly Aunt Copp and her blunt, candid son Sam in their early career. The story is pretty and telling."—The World.

32. LADY GRACE.

THIRTY-FIRST THOUSAND.

"The loss of a writer whose works have ever deserved to be standing favourities in the family circle must be sincerely deplored. Showing real talent, an inexhaustible imagination, and always thoroughly wholesome in tone, Mrs. Wood's books can be placed in the hands of coaders of all ages. Lady Grace' worshily closes a series of a vector thoroughly lengths in feeling and sentiment, and which fairly illustrate many phases of our national life." MORNING POST.

33. ADAM GRAINGER.

TWENTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

"This is a highly moral and religion; story, in Mrs. Wood's well-known manner, written with an anti-suicidal aim. Adam Grainger has many troubles, and a large family, and is sorely tempted to put an end to his exitence. He 'stay, his hand,' however, and has his reward by an unexpected piece of good fortune."—The World.

34. THE UNHOLY WISH.

35. JOHNNY LUDLOW. Fourth Series.

TWENTIETH THOUSAND.

"In some instances Johnny Luddow attains to genuine pathos; in others a considerable sense of humour is displayed. There is a great deal of honest purpose underlying the stories. The author shows vigour in description. The book contains an automor of matter which places it in most favourable contrast to the ordinary three-volume novel. "—ATHERSOM,

"Anyone who has not yet read." Johnny Ludlow, had better the so at once,"—ACADRMY.

IOHNNY LUDLOW. Fifth Series.

TWENTIETH THOUSAND.

"Johnny Ludlow is very real to us as a character, but of his style we have never met wirk, any trace hitherto. It is his own unmistakably; unaffected, natural. . . . . We recommend our readers to produce the book for themselves, and we are quite certain that they will thank us for having led them to a rare enjoyment." - Nonconversation.

JOHNNY LUDLOW. Sixth Series.

EIFTEENTH THOUSAND.

"There are few if any better backs than I Johanny Ludlow," who may be recommended as a sleasant and profitable acquaintance to all who have not already had the benefit of his society Pery few recent stories have surpassed these in homely path a anotyrise the britenton in a control of Pery few recent stories have surpassed these in homely path a anotyrist and refer homen. The local colouring and the delineation of character are singularly adoutable, "—Grane.

"A general connecting link runs through the whole, so that, like Accra beads, while each negly is valuable, the whole string forms a choice necklare," —Tost Home, in Fox.

"A very pleasant fellow is Johnny—a capital story teller, and a right heatty, layal com anion. . . . The tales, told as they are with a simple truthfulness that makes them only so real, move the reader perhaps more than he would care to confeas "-Monning Pour.

38. PARKWATER.

SEVENTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

ACMILLAN AND CO., LIMITED, LONDON.